FICTIONS OF MADNESS

Shattering Minds and Worlds in Modernist Finnish Literature

Anna Ovaska

DOCTORAL DISSERTATION

to be presented for public discussion with the permission of the Faculty of Arts of the University of Helsinki, in lecture room 107, Athena (Siltavuorenpenget 3 A), on the 28th of February, 2020 at 12 o’clock.
Abstract

Fictions of Madness is a study about the forms and functions of representations of “madness” in literary narratives. It focuses on experiences of shattering and distress in a corpus of first-person narrated modernist Finnish novels, and examines them through four sets of questions: 1) the narrative construction of shattering minds and experiential worlds, 2) the ways readers are invited to engage with the minds and worlds created in the texts, 3) the ethical problems and power relations inherent in storytelling and in reading about mental distress and illness, and 4) the ways in which fiction generates knowledge and understanding about experiences of pain and suffering.

Drawing on a wide range of narrative theory, phenomenology, enactivist theories, and feminist theory, the study shows how fictional portrayals of “madness” employ and challenge their readers’ personal, cultural, and scientific understanding of psychiatric disability and experiences of distress. Instead of portraying minds and mental illness as disembodied or disengaged from the world, the novels discussed—Helvi Hämäläinen’s Kaunis sielu (The Beautiful Soul, 1928/2001), Jorma Korpela’s Tohtori Finckelman (Doctor Finckelman, 1952), Timo K. Mukka’s Tabu (The Taboo, 1965) and Maria Vaara’s Likaiset legendat (The Dirty Legends, 1974)—conceive them as bodily and embedded in the world, enacted in intercorporeal and intersubjective relations with other people and with the world, and entangled in socio-cultural norms and narratives that shape identity, gender, and sexuality. Further, the novels emphasize the aesthetic and constructed nature of the experiences of shattering evoked in fiction, more specifically in texts narrated in the first person. The analyses reveal how fictional stories can resist fixed cultural narratives of “normal” and “abnormal,” “natural” and “unnatural,” and “healthy” and “pathological” through their ambiguity and complexity. The discussed novels invite readers to ask aesthetic, ethical, and political questions about our views of psychiatric disabilities and persons suffering from them, and about the fictional portrayals and techniques of representation: How can we approach unusual and unsettling experiences without pathologizing or stigmatizing them? How can we honor the complexity of the experiences of others and cultivate an openness to difference?

The study participates in the work done in the field of critical medical humanities and offers a Nordic perspective to representations of mental illness in literary fiction. It contributes to the understanding of how fictional narratives evoke and convey experiences of illness and distress, the role of narrative empathy and aesthetic immersion in understanding unsettling experiences, and how narratives create knowledge about the experiences of others. From a literary historical perspective, the study also sheds light on the ways the mind, consciousness and mental illness were discussed and portrayed in Finnish literature throughout the twentieth century, and situates the Finnish modernist works in the international modernist tradition.

Keywords: fictional minds, illness narratives, Finnish modernism, psychiatric disability, phenomenology, enactivism, narrative theory, critical medical humanities
Acknowledgments

I would like to warmly thank my supervisors, Professor Pirjo Lyytikäinen, Professor Ansgar Nünning and Docent Riikka Rossi who have made it possible that this work exists in the first place. My deep appreciation also goes to the pre-examiners of the thesis, Professor Hanna Meretoja and Professor Patricia Waugh whose insightful comments and support helped me to finalize the manuscript and whose recognition has been very valuable to me. I am extremely grateful to Professor Mary E. Wood for agreeing to serve as the discussant, travelling to Finland to participate in our academic tradition, and bringing her expertise on the connections of literature, life writing, and experiences of “madness” to the defense. Warmest thanks also to Professor Hanna Korsberg who agreed to serve as the Custos in the defense.

When I started this work, I soon found an amazing group of people who have been a wonderful source of support during the research. Thank you to my colleagues and the coordinators in the European PhD Network for the Literary and Cultural Studies in Giessen, Lisbon, Bergamo, Graz, and Stockholm for their friendship: Ana do Carmo, Eva Fauner, Sara Eriksson, Ioanna Kipourou, Stella Lange, Verena Lindeman, Sanja Nivesjö, Laura Oulanne, Sabine Schönhelner, Emmanuel Steltzer, Snežana Vuletić, and Anna Weigel as well as Natalya Bekhta (also for some important comments), Nora Berning, and Imke Polland (to whom I owe special thanks for all the work in organizing the defense). I am also indebted to Professors Angela Locatelli and Heta Pyrhönen for their wise comments and support during the PhDnet cycle.

The opportunity to travel and visit other universities has been vital for this project, first during the PhDnet and especially during the past three years of writing. I am extremely thankful to Professor Maura Spiegel at the Narrative Medicine program at Columbia University for inviting me as a Fulbright Pre-Doctoral Research Fellow to the program which has inspired me ever since I first learned about it. I also wish to thank Elizabeth Whitney and JV Fuqua for all their support in New York and for the help with the title of the thesis. I am indebted to Kris Clarke for inviting me to California State University, Fresno during the Fulbright year and for our discussions there—they have been important. I am also extremely thankful to Professor Sowon Park for offering me a chance to visit the Literature and the Mind program at UC Santa Barbara and for all the inspiration and discussions on Woolf. Thanks to the people at Literature and the Mind for making me feel so welcomed during my stay. Especially Rebecca Baker and Aili Pettersson Peekar, thank you! The visits to New York, Fresno, and Santa Barbara have been highly significant for this project: they have offered me inspiration, new perspectives and spaces to think and write.

I am very grateful to Alfred Kordelin Foundation for my first year of funding, Fulbright Finland Foundation for the scholarship and chance to spend the semester at the Narrative Medicine program, and the Doctoral Programme in Philosophy, Arts and Society at University of Helsinki for offering me a three-year position to focus on the work. Thank you to Kate Sotejeff-Wilson for all the help with the language and proofreading of the text. I also wish to extend my special thanks to Professor Hanna Lehti-Eklund and Kaarina Walter from the Department of Finnish, Finno-Ugrian and Scandinavian Studies at University of Helsinki, Rose Lawson from the Department of English at Justus Liebig University, and Päivi Väätänen from the Doctoral Programme in Philosophy, Arts and Society at University of Helsinki for their kind responses and help in many practical issues during the years. Thank you also to Soile Piispa who has created a scaffolding for me and the thesis.
Acknowledgments

From our department, the doctoral programme, and Finnish and comparative literatures at University of Helsinki, I would like to especially thank Eeva-Liisa Bastman, Katariina Harjunpää, Sarianna Kankkunen, Erika Laamanen, Harri Mäcklin, Hanna Mäkelä, Elise Nykänen, and Anna Tomi. Thank you for all the discussions, support and friendship. My special appreciation goes to Sari Salin for her extremely valuable comments at the final stages of the work.

This study was shaped in collaboration with two important groups of people. I am enormously grateful to our philosophy of psychiatry group: Ferdinand Garoff, Professor Marija-Liisa Honkasalo, Laura Oulanne, Pii Telakivi, Sanna Tirkkonen, Tuomas Vesterinen, and others. You have provided a safe, caring, bright, and joyous community for me and been there the whole way, thank you so much for everything! I am also indebted to our enactivism group which has been extremely important in tackling theoretical issues and making sense of things. My warmest thanks to Kaisa Kortekallio, Caroline Kutsch, Saara Moisio, Merja Polvinen, Laura Oulanne, Pii Telakivi, Essi Varis, and all the others.

For wonderful teaching opportunities, I am deeply grateful to Professor Päivi Lappalainen and the Research Center in Culture and Health at University of Turku and Lecturer Mikko Kanninen at the Programme in Theatre Arts at University of Tampere as well as the Master’s Programme in Literature at University of Helsinki. Thank you to all my students in Turku, Tampere and Helsinki—teaching has helped me to think and it has been invaluable for the writing of this work.

I wish to thank my friends and colleagues at the philosophical magazine niin & näin—my academic home. Thanks to Jaakko Belt and Tytti Rantanen for all the support and care, to Antti Salminen for creating time for me, to Elina Halttunen-Riikonen for our explorations in feminist philosophy and translation, to Ville Lähde and Jarkko S. Tuusvuori for teaching me so much, and thanks to all the members of the editorial board for the friendship and all the fun and plans for Cuba.

My deepest gratitude goes to my amazing friend and colleague Laura Oulanne without whom this thesis could not exist. Thank you for all the support, your insightful comments and help in every stage of the research and writing, the travels, the teaching, the presentations, and the planning of future together. Finally, I wish to thank my family and friends, Anne, Esko, Aino, my grandmother Anja, who always believes in me, Julia, Anna-Leena, Anni, and Essi for all the love and care. And my partner Toni Laurila, thank you for checking the bibliography and my translations and for fixing my computer, and for everything.

Helsinki, October 2019
Contents

Abstract 3
Acknowledgments 4
Contents 7
Introduction 9
  Overview 17

Chapter 1 • Reading Modernist Madness 20
  1.1. Shattering Minds and Worlds 20
      Modernist Explorations of the Mind and Consciousness 21
      The Embodied Mind, Mental Illness, and the Social World 25
  1.2. Engaging with Fictions of Madness 29
      The Embodied Reader, Immersion, and Reflection 31
      Diagnostic Efforts 34
      Empathy and Ethical Distance 40
  1.3. What Fictions of Madness Do 42
  1.4. Finnish Modernism: A Closer Look on the Novels 45
      The Beautiful Soul 47
      Doctor Finckelman 52
      The Taboo 56
      The Dirty Legends 59

Chapter 2 • A Mind in a World: Affective, Aesthetic, and Political Transgressions in Kaunis sielu 65
  2.1. The Construction of the Experiential World 71
      A Mind in Constant Movement 71
      A Struggle to Narrate: Immediacy and Distance 73
      The Self and the Disturbing Other 78
  2.2. The Solipsistic Mind and Construction of the “Outside” World 83
      A Story of a Murder 86
      Aesthetic, Imaginary, and Hallucinatory Worlds 91
  2.3. Affective Patterns and Shaping Norms 94
      Unconscious Associations and Affective Engagements 94
      Feelings of Queer Shame and Pleasure 99
      Against Oppressive Narratives 105
  2.4. Affective, Aesthetic, and Political Transgressions 109
Chapter 3  ·  A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation: Madness, Metafiction, and Ethics in Tohtori Finckelman 113

3.1. The Unreliable Narrator and the Blending of Fiction and Reality 117
   The Hazy Borders 119
   The Power of Fiction 124
   Composing a Life 128

3.2. Man or Machine? Psychological and Metafictional Readings 131
   Dr. Finckelman and Feelings of Being Non-Human 135
   Doubles, Projections, and Mirroring 144
   Empathy and Estrangement 152

3.3. Mad or Bad? Distancing Ourselves 155
   Underreporting or Misinterpreting? 157
   Slips of the Tongue and Strange Hints 161
   From Unreliability to Undecidability 167

3.4. The Other World 168
   Three Interpretive Paths 174
   The True Face of Dr. Finckelman 185

3.5. Reading Others and Ethics 188

Chapter 4  ·  A Strange Atmosphere: Trauma and Tragedy in Tabu 198

4.1. Reading Experiences of Abuse and Trauma 203
   The Intersubjective Bond: Milka and Anna 204
   Reading the Christ/Devil 206
   Ambiguity, Abuse, and Trauma 212

4.2. Reading the Tragedy 218
   Milka’s Tragic Mistakes 219
   Anna’s Hybris 222
   The Recognition 224

4.3. Trauma and Interpersonal Madness 231

4.4. The Strange Atmosphere and the Reader 241

Chapter 5  ·  A Shattering World: Hallucinatory Spaces, Stories, and Images in Likaiset legendat 247

5.1. The Loss of Self 252
5.2. The World of Psychosis 259
   Navigating Spaces 259
   Shared and Forbidden Worlds 267

5.3. Fictions of Psychosis 270
   Legends of Shame and Guilt 272
   Therapeutic Images and Narratives 276

5.4. Knowledge and Understanding in Fictional and Autofictional Stories of Shattering 279

Conclusion 282
Bibliography 285
Introduction

My God, my God, am I going insane? Everything is muddled, I cannot arrange events in my mind.

– Helvi Hämäläinen, Kaunis sielu

I didn’t have any kind of illness, it was otherwise hard. I wonder if other people feel the way I do, I thought then.

– Jorma Korpela, Tohtori Finckelman

I was afraid that she had lost her sanity. I was afraid that also my own thoughts had lost their everything.

– Timo K. Mukka, Tabu

Maria has gone away, I have gone away. The others have come.

– Maria Vaara, Likaiset legendat

The fictional characters and narrators examined in this study uncover diverse experiences of “losing one’s mind”: losing one’s sense of self, the connection to other people, and the boundaries between the self and the world. The narrator of Helvi Hämäläinen’s Kaunis sielu (The Beautiful Soul, 1928/2001) tells her readers that she cannot arrange her thoughts or what happens around her; she feels confused and fears that she is going insane. Jorma Korpela’s narrator-protagonist in Tohtori Finckelman (Doctor Finckelman, 1952) explicitly denies any illness but describes a heaviness he felt as a young man and how he wondered if life was as hard for other people too. Milka, in Timo K. Mukka’s Tabu (The Taboo, 1965), depicts how she watched her mother lose her “sanity” and feared that her own thoughts, too, “had lost their everything.” Finally, in Maria Vaara’s Likaiset legendat (The Dirty Legends, 1974), the narrator-protagonist Maria portrays how she loses touch with herself and reality, and how strange voices take control of her experiential world.

1 “Jumalani, Jumalani, tulenko hulluksi? Kaikki on sekaisin, en voi järjestää tapahtumia mielessäni.” (KS 8.) All English translations in the text are mine unless otherwise indicated.

2 “Minua ei vaivannut mikään tauti, oli muuten raskasta. Onkohan muilla ihmisillä samanlaista kuin minulla, ajattelin silloin.” (TF 9.)

3 “Minä pelkäsin että hän oli menettänyt järkensä, pelkäsin, että omatkin ajatukseni olivat kadottaneet kaikkensa.” (T 72.)

4 “Maria on mennyt pois, minä olen mennyt pois. Ne toiset ovat tulleet.” (LL 63.)
This study grew from an interest in literary representations of unusual and unsettling experiences which are often interpreted (either by the experiencers themselves or by other people) as symptoms of “madness” or “mental illness”—experiences like the ones described above: feelings of anxiety and alienation, hallucinations and delusions, and the shattering of borders between the self and the world. Moreover, I was interested in the ways literary language and fiction can convey subjective experiences and bring readers close to the minds of others—even feel that we are “inside” another person’s experiential world. Like many other readers, I had a sense that literary narratives in general, and first-person narrated texts in particular, are able to create a strong feeling of being with another person. Literary works, in their descriptive detail and affective power, are some of the most powerful ways of representing, enacting and conveying experiences, even ones that are unsettling and strange for those experiencing or witnessing them.

Another initial insight was that particularly modernist literature, both abroad and in Finland, is filled with evocative portrayals of distress and shattering that seem to capture the lived meaning of such experiences. This has been noted, for example, by the phenomenologist and psychologist Louis Sass, in his Madness and Modernism (1992), which was one of the early sources of inspiration for this study. According to Sass, there is an affinity between experiences of “madness” and modernist art: for example, an acute sense of self-consciousness and self-awareness (what he calls “hyperreflexivity”) combined with experiences of alienation from the shared world and detachment from oneself. Likewise, the linguist and psychoanalyst Julia Kristeva has studied the margins of subjectivity and language in the arts and literature throughout her career, and especially her La révolution du langage poétique (1974) focused on the transgressive effects of modernist poetic languages on the speaking subject and the social world.

---

5 I follow Dorrit Cohn’s (1978) usage of the terms “third-person” and “first-person narration” for the simple reason that they are most recognizable for readers outside of narratology. As James Phelan (2005, xi) notes, Gérard Genette’s (1981) more precise terms “extradiegetic” and “intradiegetic narration” are less user-friendly, although they better capture the distinction between narrators who narrate events from another level of existence than the storyworld and without participating in the events (third-person/extra-heterodiegetic narration) and narrators who exist on the same level as the characters and who are often protagonists in their own stories (first-person/intra-homodiegetic narration). Phelan’s more user-friendly alternative for intra-homodiegetic narration, “character narration,” also conveys the idea of a narrator who is inside the storyworld and participates in the events, but it, too, is less intuitive than first-person narration.

6 Other important studies which explore the connections between modernist literature, experiences of “madness” and the margins of the self are, e.g., Shoshana Felman’s Writing and Madness (1978/2003), Judith Ryan’s The Vanishing Subject (1991), and the collection The Mind of Modernism (2004) edited by Mark S. Micale. There is, however, a danger in conflating “mad-
Introduction

It is not surprising that philosophers, psychologists, psychoanalysts, medical practitioners, sociologists, and other researchers interested in the margins of being have been looking to literary fiction for insight, and in recent years fields like “madness studies”, narrative medicine, and critical medical humanities have further developed these interdisciplinary connections between the medical sciences, humanities, and social sciences and paid attention to the ways different forms of knowledge are entangled. At the same time, literary scholars like Dorrit Cohn (1978; 1999) and Mary E. Wood (1994; 2013) have emphasized the need to analyze the distinctive features of literary and narrative discourses and the specific techniques authors use to evoke minds and experiences and to affect their audiences. Literature is a valuable source of understanding and knowledge about our being in the world and with others, but it creates its own techniques and realm of aesthetic meaning, which deserve further investigation.

To discuss how literature represents, enacts, and conveys unusual and unsettling experiences, this study turns to narratological research on fictional minds and brings narrative theory into conversation with phenomenology, philosophy of mind, and cognitive sciences. Drawing from phenomenological and enactivist theories about the mind, self, body, affectivity, and intersubjectivity, as well as rhetorical, cognitive, and unnatural narratology, I develop theory and analyses about the narrative construction and reading of shattering minds and experiential worlds. The focus of analysis is on four modernist and late modernist novels—Helvi Hämäläinen’s Kaunis sielu (1928/2001), Jorma Korpela’s Tohtori Finckelman (1952), Timo K. Mukka’s Tabu (1965) and Maria Vaara’s Likaiset legendat (1974)—which each pay special attention to the margins of subjectivity and strive to turn experiences of shattering, distress and pain into words and storyworlds. I have chosen these works because they offer particularly compelling portrayals of mental distress from a first-person perspective and invite reflection on the cultural meanings of “madness” as well as on the possibilities of literature to convey experiences. The chosen works also offer a temporally wide-ranging overview of Finnish modernist prose: the analyses shed light on how Finnish modernist writers used the technique of first-person narration and offer new readings of Finnish modernist texts written from the late 1920s to the early 1970s, some of which have not been extensively studied before.

---

7 Freud is of course famous for his use of literature in his psychoanalytical works. For a historical survey on the connections between literature and “madness,” see, e.g., Feder 1980; Thiher 1999. Especially Michel Foucault’s work on structures of power, medicine, and history of “madness” has influenced the cultural study of madness and the field of critical medical humanities. For a recent introduction to critical medical humanities as a form of social critique, see Whitehead 2014; Whitehead & Woods 2016. For narrative medicine, see Charon 2006; 2016 a&b.

The title, Fictions of Madness, points, on the one hand, toward the changing social and cultural conceptions of madness—toward the fictional nature of madness. “Madness” is understood here as a cultural formation, as a value-laden and culture-specific construct that is used to label and categorize (and too often to stigmatize) a great variety of experiences and behaviors that feel strange or unsettling for those experiencing or perceiving them (see also Abbott 2018, 18). This is not to say that psychiatric disabilities or mental disorders (as Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders calls them) are not real, they are. “Madness” as a social construct and label has at least two meanings: historically, it has been used to stigmatize people suffering from psychiatric disabilities, but it can also be used to create understanding about the experiences of suffering and distress. On the other hand, the title of this study reminds us of the textual, artificial, and constructed nature of the experiences and experiential worlds discussed here. The objects of research are literary creations, fictions of madness. They are narratives which construct fictional representations of unusual and unsettling experiences and invite readers to imagine such experiences and to feel their affective, aesthetic, and ethical meaning. The study poses a series of questions about the construction, reading, and interpretation of “madness.” What techniques do literary texts use in order to create shattering minds and experiential worlds? How are readers invited to engage with such minds and worlds? What kind of power relations are involved in the telling and reading about mental illness and distress? How do literary texts construct knowledge and understanding about experiences that are distressing and painful?

---

8 This kind of study on the connections between literature, health, and illness is a relatively new field in Finland, see Karttunen, Niemi & Pasternack 2007. For a discussion on the cultural meanings of illness in Finnish literature and society from the nineteenth to the twentieth centuries, see Ahlbeck, Lappalainen, Launis & Tuohela 2013; Ahlbeck, Lappalainen, Launis, Tuohela & Westerlund 2015. For a recent introduction to madness studies in Finland, see Jäntti, Heimonen, Kuuva & Mäkilä 2019.

9 In Finnish literary history, it has become customary to talk about Finnish modernisms in the plural, that is, several modernist periods between the late nineteenth century and the second half of the twentieth century, ranging from early modernism to postwar and late modernism. See, e.g., Riikonen (2007) who charts Finnish modernism(s) from the 1890s to the 1970s. For more detail, see the end of Chapter 1.

10 This second meaning is important, and in recent years researchers in madness studies have done good work in reducing the stigma around “madness” and in reframing and reclaiming the meaning of the term.
My aim is not to diagnose fictional narrators or characters, nor to answer questions about how psychiatric disabilities are or should be labeled or categorized. Rather, I ask what functions the portrayals of experiences of shattering, and labeling them as “madness,” “mental illness” or “mental disorder,” have in the texts and what kind of cultural work they do. The novels discussed here often purposely call their readers to reflect upon the causes of the characters’ experiences of distress and shattering and to try to fit them into different diagnostic categories—as if the literary characters were actual people (and as if readers were doctors or psychiatrists). However, this investigative and diagnostic work is constantly interrupted in the novels, as we will see. The analyzed texts invite their readers to pay attention to the experiences of shattering, not just as symptoms of some illness or disorder that has to be diagnosed, but as meaningful in their own right.

The analyses conducted in this study show how fictional portrayals of “madness” both use and challenge our cultural and scientific understanding of what is considered healthy or pathological, as well as common diagnostic labels such as “schizophrenia.” They renegotiate the scope of “normal” and challenge the ways we understand the mind and consciousness. Instead of portraying the mind as disembodied and disengaged from the world, the texts show it as bodily and relational, interacting with and shaped by the world and other people. As such, the novels have ethical and political significance. Furthermore, and just as importantly, they guide their readers to pay attention to the aesthetic forms: to how literary language can evoke experiences and how representations create meaning. In other words, “fictions of madness” lead to ethical, political, and aesthetical questions about our socio-cultural views of normality and abnormality and about the fictional representations and techniques. They invite their readers to reflect on ways of honoring unusual and unsettling experiences without stigmatizing them and to acknowledge the complexity of experiences and knowledge created through fiction.

As narrative scholars Käte Hamburger and Dorrit Cohn have famously argued, narrative fiction is a distinctive form of art because of its ability to provide a sense of access into minds other than one’s own (Hamburger 1973, 83; Cohn 1978, 4–6).\(^{11}\) In Transparent Minds, Cohn writes:

\(^{11}\) Narrative scholars have recently debated over the meanings of this “access” and whether readers’ understanding of fictional minds and characters is similar to or differs from our everyday understanding of other people. E.g., David Herman argues against Cohn’s “exceptionality thesis,” the view about the special access to other minds provided by fiction. He draws from contemporary phenomenology of intersubjectivity and notes that, in real life, we are usually able to know what other people are experiencing through their bodily expressions and gestures and through the world we share with them, and these same resources are at work in our engagements with fictional minds (Herman 2011a; see also Gallagher & Zahavi 2012, 204). However, I would argue that Cohn makes a much simpler claim: although we have an “access” to other people’s experiences in real life through our bodies and the shared world (we,
Fictions of Madness

[Narrative fiction is the only literary genre, as well as the only kind of narrative, in which the unspoken thoughts, feelings, perceptions of a person other than the speaker can be portrayed. (Cohn 1978, 7, emphasis mine.)

Cohn refers to the “magical power” authors of literary fiction have: the way they can reveal the experiential worlds of their characters and make readers feel as if they entered the thoughts, feelings, and perceptions of another human being. In third-person narration the uncanniness of this power is at its height: narrative techniques like psycho-narration and narrated monologue (or thought report\(^1\) and free indirect discourse) invite readers to encounter experiences that are invisible to an outside observer and that can be unconscious, unspeakable, or on the edge of verbalization, even for the characters themselves (Cohn 1978, 103; also Palmer 2004, 75–86). First-person narrators, in turn, invite readers inside their own lives: as monologists, diarists and memoirists they reveal their past and present experiences to their readers and persuade us to adapt to their perspective of the world. Yet although first-person narration is lifelike in this sense, first-person narrators often break the “mimetic code”—what is plausible or possible to do in real life—in many ways. They, for example, have knowledge that would be impossible to have in real life or they narrate what is happening to them simultaneously with the events. As such, first-person narrators often point toward their own fictionality and constructedness. (See Cohn 1978, 209–215; also Phelan 2005; 2013.)\(^1\)

First-person narration also reveals and takes advantage of the doubled nature of the speaking subject. A first-person narrator is always looking at her or himself from the outside: there is a constant gap between narration and experience, between the narrating I and the experiencing I. An important characteristic e.g., perceive another person’s pain in their bodily expressions) and these same resources are used when encountering fictional minds, Cohn emphasizes that it is a distinctive feature of literary narratives that they can construct the thoughts, inner speech and mental images of another being. This is something that can happen in real life only if the other person somehow articulates their thought contents or “stream of consciousness” to us. On the “similarity” vs. “exceptionality” of fictional and real minds and readers’ interpretive resources, see Iversen 2013a & b; Mäkelä 2013b; Caracciolo 2014b; 2016, xiv; Bernini 2016; Kukkonen & Nielsen 2018; for an overview of the discussion, see especially Bernaerts & Richardson 2018.

\(^{12}\) Alan Palmer’s (see, e.g., 2004, 75–86) alternative term for Cohn’s psycho-narration, “thought report,” neatly captures what the technique is about: it consists of a narrator’s report about what is or was going on (consciously or unconsciously) in a character’s mind (or in the case of first-person narration: a first-person narrator’s report about what is or was going on in her own mind).

\(^{13}\) As, e.g., Cohn (1978, 12) has stressed and James Phelan (2005, 1) has emphasized further, the communication structure is as complex in first-person or “character” narration as in third-person or extradiegetic narration. There is no “straight” access to the mind of a first-person narrator: even when the narrator seems to be communicating his or her experiences to the readers (to the “narratees” in Phelan’s terms) directly, without any outside mediation, there is always also an author who has made choices about the narrative design and who is communicating to the readers (to the “authorial audience”) through (or “behind”) the narrator. In other words, although first-person narrators create an illusion of a lifelike communication situation, this is a result of a complex structure.
of narrators of their own lives is that they are often unreliable. Following Greta Olson (2003), first-person narrators can be “fallible” or “untrustworthy.” They are prone to fail in their perceptions and judgments about themselves and the world around them (see also Cohn 1978, 144; Palmer 2004, 125). They are often faced with a lack of self-knowledge and with a lack of words to describe their experiences. They are painfully familiar with the insufficiency of language in capturing experiences, and they thematize this in their narration. Or they might be untrustworthy: they might purposefully try to deceive their audiences and break their trust. When encountering unreliable narrators, it becomes the readers’ task to detect this unreliability and construct what “actually” happens in the story, using clues provided by the text and its implied author (see Nünning 2005; 2008; Phelan 2005). Doubledness, fallibility and untrustworthiness are all features of the first-person perspective that authors use to create artistic effects, as we will see.

The reader’s position, when reading a first-person narrator’s account of herself, is also doubled in its own way: a reader, an I, is faced with another I. Phenomenologist Georges Poulet has described the experience of reading fiction even as an experience of becoming “invaded” by another mind:

> Because of the strange invasion of my person by the thought of another, I am a self that is granted the experience of thinking thoughts foreign to him. I am the subject of thoughts other than my own. My consciousness behaves as though it were a consciousness of another. (Poulet 1969, 56.)

A reader becomes a subject of “alien” thoughts. This kind of readerly experience, though extreme, may arise in any narrative situation (first, second, or third-person), but it appears pronounced when engaging with first-person and figural third-person narrators—and it becomes particularly interesting when talking about experiences such as hallucinations, alienation, estrangement, and other ways of being in which the connection between the self and the world has become altered. The experience of reading can even resemble hallucinating, with the important difference that it happens inside an “aesthetic frame,” in the safe space provided by the aesthetic work where readers know that fiction is fiction, no matter how lifelike or vivid it may appear.15

---

14 Especially modernist texts reveal that first-person narration and figural third-person narration (in which the narrator’s discourse and the character’s experience are intertwined) can be quite similar in their effects, see also Cohn 1978; Keen 2007, 97. In fact, sometimes it is difficult for readers to remember after reading whether a certain text is narrated in first or third person.

15 Recent empirical research shows that some readers experience fictional characters’ voices so vividly that they come close to auditory verbal hallucinations (see Alderson-Day, Bernini & Fernyhough 2017). I borrow the notion “aesthetic frame” from author Siri Hustvedt who uses it to emphasize how the understanding of fictionality is a part of the experience of reading and creating fiction. Readers or authors do not, for example, confuse themselves with fictional a kind of virtual experience through which one puts oneself in the other’s position while recognizing the difference of that position and hence not taking the other’s place. (LaCapra 1999, 699.)
The “fictions of madness” discussed in this study invite readers to imagine thoughts, feelings, and perceptions other than their own. They can evoke what trauma historian Dominic LaCapra has called “empathic unsettlement”:

Fictional texts can make us attentive toward otherness and difference: they can push us to imagine the experiences of others while maintaining a respectful distance and an understanding of what Emmanuel Lévinas (1969) described as the “otherness” of the other. While we can never step outside of our own bodies and our own perspectives and feel what another person is going through, it is possible to encounter and recognize the experiences of another in an ethical way. As noted earlier, fiction can modify the way we understand unusual experiences and the borders between “normal” and “abnormal.” Fictional texts are able to challenge our folk psychological and folk psychiatric conceptions of mental illness. They do this by exploring our being in the world and experiences of shattering in an artful form. At the same time, these texts are artistic constructions that have aesthetic meanings. Fiction evokes particular aesthetic experiences: a sense of lifelikeness and reality but also, as James Phelan puts it, a “thematic, ethical and affective significance and force which real-world experience does not have” (Phelan 2013, 171).

The literary analyses in the following chapters are guided by two main theoretical and methodological aims: 1) to bring together “psychological” and “metafictional” perspectives on fictional minds and experiences of shattering portrayed in the novels (to analyze their “lifelikeness” and “constructedness” side by side), and 2) to supplement these perspectives with an ethically and politically-oriented literary criticism and close reading, which pays attention to the cultural work that narratives do in the world. The analyses thus combine the narratological perspectives of rhetorical, cognitive, and unnatural narratology on consciousness presentation and reinforce them with politically-oriented, feminist, and new formalist approaches to the narrative form, reading, and interpretation.

characters, even when there are experiences of closeness and immersion (Hustvedt 2016, 374–380; 447–449). In her work on narrative empathy, Suzanne Keen has discussed the effects of the understanding of fictionality: she suggests that fictionality releases readers from the obligation of self-protection through skepticism and suspicion, which may then liberate us to feel with the characters in ways that would not be possible in real life (see Keen 2007, 88; 98; 106). Likewise, in recent empirical research on art reception and the enjoyment of negative emotions evoked by art, Winfried Menninghaus and his group suggest that the fictional frame helps recipients to avoid the distressing effects of negative emotions (Menninghaus et al. 2017).
Overview

In Chapter 1, I outline the key concepts, theories, and contexts, moving from modernist portrayals of minds and experiences to the contemporary understanding of the mind as enactive, embodied, and embedded in the world, to readers’ engagement with fictional minds and worlds, and finally to the specific questions of Finnish modernism. In the first section, I focus on how modernist writers constructed shattering minds and worlds both abroad and in Finland, and how the phenomenological and more recent enactivist understanding of psychiatric disability can illuminate these modernist portrayals. Following David Herman (2011b), I suggest that modernist novels do not turn “inwards,” but rather, they focus on the interaction between the self and the world, constructing the experiential worlds of their characters. I also supplement Herman’s view with a discussion on how mental distress and shattering are portrayed as alterations in a person’s experiential world. In the second section, I look at readers’ engagement with the shattering fictional minds and worlds, drawing from recent narratological discussions on fictional minds and aesthetic immersion. The argument is that stories of shattering and distress invite readers to navigate unsettling experiential worlds inside the aesthetic frame created by fiction. I also elaborate on readers’ movement from diagnostic and psychological frames of reading to empathic unsettlement, reflection, and understanding of difference. In the third section, I discuss the cultural work done by portrayals of shattering: how fictional narratives can shape our understanding of mental illness and experiences of pain and distress, as well as modify our own experiences and perceptions of others and the world. In the final section, I briefly chart the historical contexts of the analyzed texts and the previous research made on them. I situate the novels in the context of Finnish modernism and discuss their connections to the history of psychiatry and the antipsychiatric movement which started to develop after the Second World War.

In Chapter 2, I examine Helvi Hämaläinen’s (1907–1998) novel Kaunis sielu, which was written in 1927–1928 but remained unpublished until 2001, assumedly because of its representation of same-sex desire. The chapter focuses on the affective, political, and aesthetic functions of the shattering mind that Hämaläinen outlines in her work. I suggest that her experimental, modernist narration creates understanding about the way experiences unfold in interaction between the self and the world, and at the same time the novel directs the readers’ attention to the social and cultural norms and narratives that shape experience. In the first section, I look at the construction of the narrator-protagonist’s experiential world and her relationship to the “outside” world and others, especially a man with whom she has an adulterous relationship and whom she plans to murder. The second section focuses on a related topic: the way the narrator’s feelings, thoughts and imaginings color the actual world around her, including the murder scene she narrates. In the third section, I explore the unconscious associations the narrator makes while telling her story, the cultural narratives shaping her experiences, her feelings of queer shame and pleasure, and the way she revolts against normative and oppressive narratives and the closed narrative form. Finally, I elaborate on the affective, aesthetic, and political transgressions enacted in the novel: how the narrator’s efforts to portray her experiences are also efforts to shape her world and to create opportunities for living in non-normative ways.

Chapter 3 is an extensive analysis of Jorma Korpela’s (1910–1964) main work, Tohtori Finckelman (1952), which is one of the most important examples of Finnish postwar modernism, but quite unknown by readers today. Tohtori Finckelman is a Dostoyevskian-existentialist Bildungsroman: a story about the disillusionment and alienation of an orphaned young man who ultimately becomes a psychiatrist. The topic of the chapter is the divided mind created in the novel and the “dividedness” of the interpretative frames it invites. In the first section, I discuss the shattering of the borders of fiction and reality both in the narrator-protagonist’s story and in his experience. The second section introduces the two interpretive frames or paths invited by the novel—psychological and metafictional—and focuses on different readerly responses to the narrator and to the other characters in the story, drawing from a selection of actual readers’ experiences and interpretations from previous analyses and reviews. In the third section, I discuss how the text invites us to distance ourselves from the narrator and to reflect on his unreliability: I offer a new reading of the narrator-protagonist as a misogynous character trapped inside oppressive narratives of masculinity. In the fourth section, I discuss the hallucinatory-imaginary world created inside the storyworld and look for answers about a crime, the rape of the protagonist’s patient, that happens in the story. In the final section, I continue the discussion on reading, storytelling, and ethics that was started in Chapter 1 and elaborate on the central themes of the novel: the relationship between the self and the others and the structures of power and violence.

Chapter 4 focuses on northern Finnish writer Timo K. Mukka’s (1944–1973) novella Tabu (1965), which is a story of a young girl who falls in love with an adult man who, in my reading, sexually abuses her. The story draws on cultural and religious taboos that regulate sexual relations, and it creates a mythical base structure which follows, in a tragic form, the myths of the Immaculate Conception and virgin birth. The main topics of the chapter are the ambiguity of the story, the way it is narrated from the girl’s perspective, the possibility for conflicting interpretations, and the strange atmosphere which permeates the whole novella. In the first section, I discuss Tabu as a story about sexual abuse and offer the first comprehensive reading of the novella as a narrative of abuse and trauma. This interpretation has largely been ignored in previous analyses, which focus mainly on the generic frames, myths, and symbols the text uses. In the second and third sections, I explore the tragedy form that the story follows, the invitations to mythical and allegorical modes of reading, and the interpersonal trauma and madness constructed in the novella: how the minds of one character after another are shattered. The final section elaborates on the all-enveloping uncertainty which affects the reading experience of the novella, creating what I describe as a reader’s version of the “delusional atmosphere” (Jaspers 1963).

In the fifth and final chapter, I turn to autobiographical fiction in an analysis of Maria Vaara’s (1931–1992) novel Likaiset legendat (1974) which is based on Vaara’s own experiences of psychosis. Vaara’s work is one of the first autobiographical accounts of psychosis and institutionalization in Finnish literature, and it draws from modernist themes and techniques. I trace how Vaara’s writing constructs hallucinations and delusions, and how it invites readers “inside” a psychotic experiential world. Furthermore, I show the way the novel portrays mental illness as linked to forms of violence and interpersonal trauma. I begin the chapter by discussing the novel’s main techniques of depicting psychosis: the oscillation between third and first-person narration and the portrayal of a “loss of self” through narrative structure, images, and metaphors. The second section focuses on the construction of an altered sense of time and space, and how the psychotic world is shared with readers. In the third section, I look at how the stories and images evoked in the protagonist’s hallucinations repeat oppressive cultural and religious narratives about sexuality, but also how they can be used as a form of therapy. Finally, I return to the questions of understanding and knowledge created in and through the “fictions of madness.”
CHAPTER 1

Reading Modernist Madness

1.1. Shattering Minds and Worlds

But he [Septimus] would not go mad. He would shut his eyes; he would see no more.

But they beckoned; leaves were alive; trees were alive. And the leaves being connected by millions of fibres with his own body, there on the seat, fanned it up and down; when the branch stretched he, too, made that statement. The sparrows fluttering, rising, and falling in jagged fountains were part of the pattern; the white and blue, barred with black branches. Sounds made harmonies with premeditation; the spaces between them were as significant as the sounds. A child cried. Rightly away a horn sounded. All taken together meant the birth of a new religion ---

“Septimus!” Said Rezia. He started violently. People must notice. (Woolf 2004, 18.)

Virginia Woolf’s famous portrayal of Septimus Warren Smith’s experiences in Mrs Dalloway (1925) offers an important viewing point for shattering minds and worlds in modernist fiction. Through Septimus’s character, Woolf created a seminal representation of trauma and loss of borders between the self and the world, which reveals features that are important also in the Finnish modernist texts. In the passage above, Woolf constructs the experiential world of Septimus, a young First World War veteran suffering from what would today be likely identified as post-traumatic stress disorder. The narrator renders Septimus’s thoughts through narrated monologue and focuses on the way Septimus experiences his body as merging with his environment, moving and thinking with the world, feeling nature around him (the trees, leaves, and sparrows) as part of his body. The borders between himself and the world are breaking down, and the world takes on a curious meaning, creating something similar to what phenomenological psychiatry has called a “delusional atmosphere”: a strange, enigmatic atmosphere that sets in before psychotic hallucinations or delusions take hold (see Jaspers 1963, 98; Sass 1994, 44–45).

At the beginning of the passage, the experience is framed as “madness,” but this is done through negation—“he would not go mad”—leaving room for other interpretations. The main reason why readers are likely to interpret Septimus’s experiences as symptoms of a mental illness (and not, for instance, through a religious frame, which the text also offers) is that soon after this passage the experiences become disturbing and painful: he goes through distressing hallucinations, which take him back to the death of his officer in the war. However, the focus of Woolf’s narration is not on finding a diagnostic label for Septimus, but rather on the way he experiences the world after a series of traumatic events. As David Herman (2011b, 244) emphasizes, “Woolf uses Septimus not just to thematize mental disability but to enact the way the world is experienced by someone suffering from psychotic delusions.” More important than any diagnosis are experiences and their articulation through narrative means: Woolf shows how the world becomes strange and unsettling as a result of trauma. In the following, I first look more closely at some of the ways modernist writers portrayed the mind, the consciousness, and the self. Then, I introduce the contemporary view of the embodied mind and elaborate on the notion that experiences of mental illness and shattering are alterations in a person’s experiential world, tightly connected to the social and material world and the possibilities it offers.

Modernist Explorations of the Mind and Consciousness

Interest in unsettling and strange experiences is often seen as one dominant strand of modernist literature and thought. This attentiveness to the margins of being connects with modernism’s more general thematic and formal interest in the mind and the self. As Randal Stevenson (1992, 2) puts it, the “heightened concern with individual, subjective consciousness” is understood as a defining trait of modernist fiction. David Herman (2011b, 243) likewise sums up different perspectives on modernism by stating that modernist writers, “despite their surface differences,” shared a common project: “the project of foregrounding […] the domain of the mental, including sense impressions, emotions, memories, associative thought patterns and so on.” Modernist writers all around the world focused on moments in which the borders between the self and the world become fragile and subjectivity becomes precarious. They sought to communicate to their readers experiences like dreams, hallucinations, delusions, the loss of borders between the self and the world, and feelings of alienation and detachment from oneself and others.

16 I have elsewhere compared Septimus’s experiences of merging with the world and his “extended mind” to the similar experiences of the other characters in the novel: in fact, Woolf shows the way all experience is shaped, even constituted by the environment, not just experiences that can be interpreted as pathological. What makes Septimus different is that for him, the common ways of interacting with and being scaffolded by one’s environment have become altered. See Ovaska 2017b & forthcoming. For an analysis of Septimus, see also Waugh 2016. Woolf’s portrayal of Septimus’s experiences is also discussed, e.g., by Judith Herman in her influential psychological study on trauma, Trauma and Recovery (1992).

The theme of mental illness and the focus on experiences of “shattering” offered the writers a chance to explore the relations of the mind, the body, language, and the world and to develop new techniques for representing subjective experiences and the subject’s perspective on the world. Furthermore, these investigations were responses to the changing social reality, structures of power, scientific advancements, and the destructive wars of the twentieth century. This can be seen in the work of numerous modernist writers and their followers, from Woolf to Camus, Kafka to Nabokov, and from Perkins Gilman to Frame and Plath, and the authors discussed here—Hämäläinen, Korpela, Mukka, and Vaara—participate in these modernist thematic discussions and formal experimentations from a Nordic perspective.

In Kaunis sielu, Hämäläinen creates a first-person narrator, a monologist who is constantly, obsessively, reflecting on her mental states, bodily experiences, and the world around her—resembling what Sass (1994; 1998) has called “hyperreflexivity.” The narrator fears that she is going insane, but also goes through feelings of pleasure and wonder engaging with the world. The novel is examined more closely in Chapter 2, but let us take a first look at one passage here, since it demonstrates some recurrent features of the modernist explorations of (shattering) minds—namely, how the mind is portrayed in interaction between the self and the world and the borders between the “inside” and the “outside” become hazy:

6. My head aches. The lamp disturbs me. Everything disturbs me, even my own clothes; there should not be any light, no chair, no table. Should I break the lamp, bite my hands? My God, My God, am I going insane? Everything is muddled; I cannot arrange events in my mind. A table leg appears in my thoughts, it was varnished, shorter than the others, he sat there, at that table, when we first met. Now the table leg is the only clear image in my mind. [...] I must first explain, explain carefully the table leg before I can begin. That table leg hovers around me, in my eyes, in the empty space. I bite my hands and repeat to myself: it must be explained, I can see it clearly. Varnished and some string, shorter.

Like Septimus in Woolf’s novel, Hämäläinen’s narrator suffers from a pressing fear that she is going insane. Whereas for Septimus in the passage quoted above the world appears in a new light, full of strange meaning, for the narrator of Kaunis sielu the world is, at this moment, disturbing and all meaning seems to escape her. Hämäläinen constructs a monologue in which the narrator-protagonist is reporting her experiences as they appear to her: a headache, a feeling of being disturbed by the objects around her, and a feeling a confusion. The narrator is describing her bodily reactions to her immediate environment, the disturbing lamp, the table, the chair, as well as her inner thoughts, and particularly a specific memory of a table leg, simultaneously constructing her “inner” experiences and the “outside” world. The passage creates a vivid impression of the narrator’s experience of being in the world. At the same time, the overall feeling of distress leads her to fear (to self-diagnose) that she is going insane.

Hämäläinen’s evocative portrayal of a mind in action—in constant movement, responding to and intermingling with the surrounding world—highlights some of the remarks Woolf made about the representation of consciousness in her essay “Modern Fiction” (1919/1921). Woolf outlines the objectives of modernist literature, emphasizing the effort to capture experiences as they arise for the feeling and thinking subject:

> The mind receives a myriad impressions – trivial, fantastic, evanescent, or engraved with the sharpness of steel. From all sides they come, an incessant shower of innumerable atoms; and as they fall, as they shape themselves into the life of Monday or Tuesday, the accent falls differently from of old; the moment of importance came not here but there; so that, if a writer were a free man and not a slave, if he could write what he chose, not what he must, if he could base his work upon his own feeling and not upon convention, there would be no plot, no comedy, no tragedy, no love interest or catastrophe in the accepted style, and perhaps not a single button sewn on as the Bond Street tailors would have it. (Woolf 1984, 160.)

In other words, modernist writers sought to put into words what life “feels like”: the way the fragmented impressions of the world are shaped into a continuous stream of consciousness. In a famous passage, Woolf continues by stating that:

> Life is not a series of gig lamps symmetrically arranged; life is a luminous halo, a semi-transparent envelope surrounding us from the beginning of consciousness to the end. Is it not the task of the novelist to convey this varying, this unknown and uncircumscribed spirit, whatever aberration or complexity it may display, with as little mixture of the alien and external as possible? (Woolf 1984, 160–161.)

The task of the novelist is to share this experience of being alive, of being conscious, as it emerges, and to free the portrayal of the mind—“the unknown and uncircumscribed spirit”—from the old literary conventions. As Jesse Matz
The modernist interest in the mind and consciousness has been often characterized as an “inward turn,” toward “inner worlds” or “interior depths” of the psyche (see Kahler 1973; Cohn 1978, 8, 114; Eysteinsson 1990, 26). However, as David Herman suggests in his article “Re-Minding Modernism,” modernist efforts to capture the workings of minds are perhaps more aptly described as a turn toward worlds-as-experienced—subjective worlds that are constructed in interaction between the self and its environment. He thus proposes a reconceptualization of modernist techniques and their functions:

Modernist techniques for representing consciousness can be seen as an attempt to highlight how minds at once shape and are shaped by larger experiential environments [...]. Modernist narratives, in other words, stage the moment-by-moment construction of worlds-as-experienced through an interplay between agent and environment. (Herman 2011b, 249–250.)

As Herman argues, the way many modernist writers depicted the mind and consciousness as interacting with and rooted in the world resonates with the phenomenological and contemporary enactivist understanding of the mind as embodied, embedded in, and extending to the world. For example, the focus of Hämmäläinen’s narration in Kaunis sielu is not solely on representing the inner thoughts of the narrator-protagonist, but rather the fictional consciousness is constructed as an interface in which thoughts and memories, bodily sensations, and objects of the world come together. She creates a narrative technique through which the mind is shown as embedded in and intermingling with the world. Following Herman, I suggest that phenomenological and enactivist theories—which have their roots in the early twentieth-century notions of the relationality of the mind—help to illuminate how experiences are constructed by many modernist writers: their texts do not focus on the “inside” of the mind, but rather on experiential worlds, lived bodies and spaces, and the co-construction of the mind and the world. Moreover, this view highlights the political character of modernist texts: they reveal how subjects are shaped by their cultural and material environments. Let us now look more carefully at the contemporary theories about the embodied mind and their connections to the modernist minds and experiences of shattering.

---

17 The current neo-phenomenological and enactivist theories draw from several philosophical traditions of the twentieth century, e.g., Husserl’s, Heidegger’s and Merleau-Ponty’s phenomenological theories, Dewey’s pragmatism, and Buddhist traditions. On the philosophical background of enactivism, see Varela, Thompson & Rosch 1991; Colombetti 2014; for a recent introduction to the historical roots, see Newen, De Bruin & Gallagher 2018. On the connections between early twentieth-century philosophy, psychology, and modernist literature, see, e.g., Ryan 1991; Micale 2004.
The Embodied Mind, Mental Illness, and the Social World

According to the enactivist theories (or the “four E’s”: the enactive, embodied, embedded, and extended mind), the mind is not produced solely by the brain, but it is rather a result of our sensorimotor interaction with the world. Our conscious experiences (perceiving, thinking, remembering, and imagining, etc.) are enacted by the whole living organism that is embedded in its environment (see Varela, Thompson & Rosch 1991; Thompson 2007; Colombetti 2014). A minded creature is thus understood as an embodied being that moves and acts in the world: the living body provides a perspective on the world, and its experiences are embedded in the world, shaped or even constituted by the interaction with the environment. Or as phenomenologist Thomas Fuchs (2009, 221) puts it, emphasizing the role of interpersonal relations: “The individual mind is not confined within the head, but extends throughout the living body and includes the world beyond the membrane of the organism, especially the interpersonal world of self and other; this is also the world in which mind and brain are essentially formed.” The mind is shaped in its environment, in our interpersonal and social relations to other people, as Fuchs suggests, and also in the material world, through our interactions with tools, instruments, and objects of nature. These are all part of our “affective scaffolding,” regulating our emotions and forming our experiences, offering possibilities for action or restricting our movements in the world (see Colombetti & Krueger 2015).18

The understanding of the embodied mind has also consequences for how psychiatric disabilities are understood. The mind is not confined to the skull,

---

18 In recent years, different theorists have emphasized different “E’s.” The work which most influentially introduced the idea of the embodied and enactive cognition to contemporary cognitive science and philosophy of mind, The Embodied Mind by Varela, Thompson & Rosch (1991), brought together classical phenomenology, Buddhist traditions and neurosciences. In their seminal paper “The Extended Mind” (1998), Andy Clark and David Chalmers emphasized the ways our cognitive processes (like memory) are extended into objects and tools such as notebooks. Drawing on Merleau-Ponty’s and James J. Gibson’s theories of perception, Alva Noë (2004) has underscored the enactive nature of perception: perception as action, as something that we do or achieve through our skillful action in the world. Giovanna Colombetti and Joel Krueger (2015) have, in turn, outlined the notion of the affective scaffolding of the mind in the world: the way affective states are supported by objects of the world. The terms “affectivity” and “affect” need some clarification: I use “affects” and “affectivity” as an umbrella term for existential feelings (e.g., sense of reality, situatedness, locatedness, connectedness, significance, etc., see Ratcliffe 2008; 2009), moods, atmospheres, and emotions through which subjects are attuned to the world. Emotions (e.g., love and hate) are directed to objects, whereas other affective states (e.g., existential feelings and moods) are objectless, longer-lasting, and often remain unconscious. In this view, affects are not understood as “inner” states but as phenomena that scaffold the person’s whole being in the world and are formed in interaction between the self and the world. On enactivist and phenomenological perspectives on affectivity, see Fuchs 2013; Colombetti 2014; see also Ahmed 2004 for a cultural and phenomenological perspective.
and neither are mental illnesses “inside the head.” Rather, they are alterations in the way we are in the world: in the way we navigate or make sense of our environments. As Giovanna Colombetti (2013, 1097) suggests, following biologist Jakob von Uexküll’s (1864–1944) notion of Umwelt, life-world or experiential world: “psychiatric disorders are to be understood as shifts in sense-making, resulting in an extraordinary and therefore often disconcerting Umwelt.” In other words, psychiatric disabilities are changes in the first-person perspective provided by our bodies, our embeddedness in and extendedness into the world, and in our ways of interacting with other people and the world. For example, hallucinations, delusions, and feelings of alienation and detachment can be understood as alterations in a person’s immersion or sense of presence in the world, in the experience of his or her own body, and in interpersonal relations.

The idea of the relationality of the mind and mental illness is not anything new in itself. Current phenomenological and enactivist views draw from the twentieth century traditions of psychoanalysis and phenomenological psychiatry. In many of his writings, also Freud understood the ego as embodied and deeply entangled in social relations (see Freud 1923/1962; also Grosz 1994, 31–39) and stressed how hallucinations are connected to the interpersonal world, characterizing them as internalized voices of the family and society (see Freud 1914/2012). Later in the century, phenomenologists like J. H. van den Berg described experiences of illness as alterations in a person’s world: “The patient is ill, that means, his world is ill” (van den Berg 1972, 46). A third important background for current phenomenological and enactivist psychopathology is psychologist James J. Gibson’s (1979, 127) ecological psychology and his notion of “affordances”: the possibilities for action that the world offers for a living being and that constitute their experiential world. Drawing on Gibson, changes in a person’s experiential world can be understood as a diminishment or loss of affordances—loss of possibilities to act—in the world. Or to use Colombetti’s and Krueger’s (2015) notion of “affective scaffolding”: in psychiatric disability the scaffolding, the support provided by the world, is diminished or lost.

---

19 On the consequences of the enactivist theories for psychiatry, see Fuchs 2005; 2009; Drayson 2009; Maiese 2015.
20 E.g., water affords drinking, swimming or floating, paths afford walking, books afford reading. Gibson (1979) discusses the ways the living being (human or non-human) is shaped by the affordances of its environment: its perception of the world is constructed in interaction with the worldly affordances.
21 This kind of views which emphasize the relationality of the mind also come close to the anti-psychiatric, feminist, and anthropological perspectives on psychiatric disabilities, as well as the perspectives of mental health advocacy groups such as The Hearing Voices Movement, which stress that experiences of distress are tied to cultural and social circumstances and emphasize that many psychiatric disorders are linked to traumatic experiences, violence, oppression, and marginalization (see, e.g., Bateson 1972; Nicki 2001; Marrow & Luhrmann 2016; Romme & Escher 2012). Both the phenomenological-enactivist and the cultural perspectives thus agree.
Chapter 1: Reading Modernist Madness

The modernist portrayals of shattering minds and worlds discussed here can be aligned with such phenomenological, enactivist, psychoanalytical, and ecological descriptions of how a person’s experiential world is altered in experiences of mental illness. What I argue throughout this study is that the “fictions of madness” discussed here highlight the relationality of the mind: its construction in interaction with the world and other people. This is what happens in the cited passage in Kaunis sielu, and in Septimus’s scene in Mrs Dalloway. Likewise, in Korpela’s Tohtori Finckelma the unnamed narrator-protagonist depicts how the world around him becomes unsettling after a series of distressing events:

Everything is quite strange, nothing is as it should be. It feels empty, stagnant, as if the nature had had a stroke. Something has happened, I realize, something that very unpleasantly pushes its way into my life too. It is as if some kind of ropes were pulling my world off its rails, invisible ropes. This is none of my business, nothing that has happened, I say, not at all, there’s no point in pulling… Leave me alone, I am an outsider… But still they force their way through, something keeps pulling the raft on which I am standing […].

Kaikki on perin kummallista, ei mikään ole niin kuin pitäisi. Tuntuu tyhjältä, seisahtuneelta, on kuin luonto olisi saanut halvauksen. On sattunut jotakin, havaitsen, jotakin joka hyvin epämiellyttävästi työntyy minunkin elämääni. Jonkinlaiset köydet ikään kuin kiskovat minun maailmaani pois raiteltaan, näkymättömät köydet. Ei tämä minulle kuulu, tämä kaikki mikä on tapahtunut, sanon, ei ollenkaan, turha kisko… Jättäkää rauhaan, olen sivullinen… Mutta ne työntyvät sittenkin, jokin vain kisko sitä lauttaa jolla seison […]. (TF 315.)

Like Hämäläinen’s and Woolf’s portrayals of unsettling experiences, Tohtori Finckelman directs the readers’ attention to the fictional character’s affective and bodily engagement with his physical and social environment. The text not only thematizes the mental distress of the character and creates a metaphor for the experience but enacts what it feels like to go through such experiences. These that psychiatric disorders are not “in the head” but connected in complex ways to the social world, to other people, and to the possibilities to live and act in the world. They stress that psychiatric disorders have both biological and environmental, or social, causes—and that it is difficult to separate the two. Even those illnesses that are understood as largely neurobiological (e.g., schizophrenia and schizoaffective disorder) are affected—improved or worsened—by the support (or lack thereof) provided by the social and material environment. In phenomenological psychiatry, Matthew Ratcliffe (2017) has recently paid attention to the links between trauma and schizophrenia. As he suggests (following Judith Herman (1992)), trauma involves a loss of trust in the world and other people, and this fundamental loss of basic trust may result in alterations in one’s sense of time and space and ultimately in experiences like flashbacks, delusions, and hallucinations. I discuss Ratcliffe’s views on trauma and psychosis in Chapters 4 and 5. modernist works, in other words, construct the first-person perspective of someone whose experiential world is changing: Hämäläinen and Korpela in a first-person narrative context, Woolf in figural third-person narration. The novels create phenomenologically insightful descriptions of shattering and distress. Most importantly, these texts do more than portray: they convey experiences to readers by inviting us to reflect on our own experiences of being embodied agents embedded in the world—a topic to which I return in the next section.

At the same time, it is important to stress that the modernist portrayals of the mind and experience are products of a specific cultural situation. As many researchers of modernism have noted, along with interest in the mind and its relation to the world came skepticism and doubt about the modern world and society (see Eysteinsson 1990, 26–30; Matz 2006, 215). Modernist literature is even sometimes characterized as literature of trauma: modernist works transform into words the traumas of the two world wars, oppressive social systems, and even the trauma of modernity itself (see Cvetkovich 2003, 17; Kaplan 2005, 24; Taylor 2012, 29–32). Modernist texts—including the novels discussed here—repeatedly make visible the growing understanding of how subjects are shaped by their social and cultural environments and how hidden or unconscious social restrictions and norms govern the subjects’ possibilities for action in the world. Moreover, they reveal how traumatic events, loss, damage, and oppressive environments affect the subjects’ lived worlds. The novels pay close attention to how subjects are situated in the world in different ways and offered different kinds of possibilities for agency and action.

The understanding of affordances or possibilities for action resonates also with recent feminist phenomenology which focuses on the experiences of marginalized subjects.\(^{22}\) For example, Sara Ahmed (2004; 2006) has examined how social and cultural norms, scripts, and narratives regulate subjects’ bodies, experiences, and agency by controlling what different kinds of bodies (female, queer, racialized) can do in the world. She compares the way cultural norms work on bodies to repetitive strain injuries, highlighting how society and culture shape bodies and bodily movements:

Through repeating some gestures and not others, or through being orientated in some directions and not others, bodies become contorted; they get twisted into shapes that enable some action only insofar as they restrict capacity for other kinds of action. (Ahmed 2004, 145.)

Ahmed focuses on experiences of pain and suffering which are caused by deviating from the cultural norms and scripts that govern gender and sexuality: what kind of behavior is allowed for women, what kind of sexuality is culturally accept-able. Yet, precisely because she does not stigmatize the experiences of suffering and pain by labelling them as pathological, her perspective can draw attention to how experiences of distress and shattering are connected to the possibilities afforded or denied in the society and culture. This becomes important in all the novels analyzed in this study: we will see how socio-cultural circumstances shape experiential worlds and how the fictional narratives of shattering, pain, and distress are closely tied to gender and sexuality. The analyzed novels embody the modernist desire to challenge normative ideas and ideologies, and ways of being and knowing, and pay attention to oppressive and violent social systems and structures (see also Kahan 2013, 348). I return to the analyzed texts and their specific contexts in Finnish literary history in the final part of this chapter, but before that, let us briefly focus on the questions of reading “fictions of madness.”

---

\(^{22}\) For an introduction to feminist phenomenology, see Cohen Shabot & Laundry 2018. In the background of the current discussions is Simone de Beauvoir’s phenomenological work on women’s experiences.
Chapter 1: Reading Modernist Madness

1.2. Engaging with Fictions of Madness

The understanding of reading in this study also takes its cue from Woolf. In “Reading” (c. 1919), Woolf describes her own engagement with books as follows:

and somehow or another, the windows being open, and the book held so that it rested upon a background of escallonia hedges and distant blue, instead of being a book it seemed as if what I read was laid upon the landscape not printed, bound, or sewn up, but somehow the product of trees and fields and the hot summer sky, like the air which swam, on fine mornings, round the outlines of things. (Woolf 1988, 142.)

For Woolf, reading is a spatial and bodily experience. Our lives and our being in the world are first and foremost bodily, and also when we read, we respond to texts through our bodies situated in space and time. When reading, we are attuned to the experiences and the storyworlds constructed in the texts, at the same time remaining in our own bodies and worlds.23 There is a strange overlapping or doubling of space, time, and subjectivity: me reading in Helsinki, in 23 Later in the essay, Woolf emphasizes the bodily sensation of the materiality of books: “The books gently swelled neath my hand as I drew it across them in the dark. Travels, histories, memoirs, the fruit of innumerable lives. The dusk was brown with them. Even the hand thus sliding seemed to feel beneath its palm fulness and ripeness.” (Woolf 1988, 164.) On Woolf's notion of reading, see Flint 1996. Phenomenological approaches to reading have likewise drawn from Woolf's ideas, see, e.g., Wolfgang Iser's “The Reading Process. A Phenomenological Approach” (1972).

---

the summer heat or in the darkness of winter how Septimus experiences his body merging with nature in Regent’s Park in London after the First World War; or how the narrator of Kaunis sielu is disturbed by the objects around her in Helsinki in late 1920s; or how the narrator of Tohtori Finckelman feels the world as empty and stagnant in an unknown time in an unknown place. Even though flesh-and-blood readers and their readings are inevitably different, we all share experiential structures which the texts can employ. Most importantly, we are all feeling and thinking creatures situated in a world.

The “reader” is thus understood here as a being who is—using the enactivist terminology—embodied, embedded in, and extending into the world. I suggest that the model reader described by rhetorical narratology, who is invited by the text and its implied author (see Phelan 2005, 19; 45), should not be seen as disembodied or disengaged from the world, affective and bodily experiences, or political and ethical considerations (see also Rosenblatt 1995, xix; Felski 2008, 16; Kukkonen 2014). Authors and texts seek to solicit responses in their readers and reading is an interactive process, an engagement between the reader and the text, which involves the body, emotions, cognition, and the reader’s cultural and literary knowledge. As Herman puts it:

> Interpreters of narrative do not merely reconstruct a sequence of events and a set of existents, but imaginatively (emotionally, viscerally) inhabit a world in which, besides happening and existing, things matter, agitate, exalt, repulse, provide grounds for laughter and grief, and so on – both for narrative

24 Recall Poulet’s (1969) understanding of reading as a kind of doubling: as an experience of being invaded by the thoughts of another.
25 In other words, I propose a synthesis of the rhetorical and more recent enactivist perspectives. In his rhetorical approach, Phelan conceptualizes the implied or model reader as an “authorial audience” who is the target of the author’s textual strategies, and whose position the flesh-and-blood reader tries to adopt (e.g., Phelan 2005, 19). In cognitive narratology, researchers who draw from enactivist theories have recently discussed the “embodied reader” as a bodily version of Booth’s “implied reader” (1983) and Iser’s “implicit/implied reader” (1978), see especially Kukkonen 2014. On the actual readers and their bodily responses, see Kuzmičová 2016; Keen 2018. For a similar, much earlier approach to reading that likewise emphasizes the readers’ bodily responses and background, see Rosenblatt (1938/1995) who came to a definition of reading as transaction between the reader and the text through Dewey’s (1934/1980) pragmatist philosophy of art. The term “implied author” also requires some clarification. Following Phelan, I understand the implied author as the “agent responsible for bringing the text into existence”; “a streamlined version of the real author, an actual or purported subset of the real author’s capacities, traits, attitudes, beliefs, values, and other properties that play an active role in the construction of the particular text” (Phelan 2005, 45). The implied author is a version of the writer, understood by the reader as such. We can, e.g., interpret the author as the agent who has chosen whether to use summary or scene, or past or present tense in a novel (Phelan 2005, 134). However, as we will see for Tohtori Finckelman, with highly self-conscious narrators, it is sometimes extremely difficult to pinpoint whether certain textual choices should be read as the author’s or the narrator’s, and this may have consequences, e.g., for how we perceive the narrator’s reliability.
agents and for interpreters working to make sense of their circumstances and (inter)actions. (Herman 2009, 119.)

When we read, we are invited to “inhabit” a world of meaning in our imagination, following the cues offered by the texts, responding to the invitations designed by the authors.

The Embodied Reader, Immersion, and Reflection

In recent years, cognitive narratologists have paid special attention to how fictional texts can invite a sense of navigating or being immersed in fictional worlds. Drawing from earlier pragmatist, phenomenological, and hermeneutic work on narratives and reading, they emphasize that reading activates our basic structures of being in the world: stories address our bodily experiences, perceptions, emotions, memories, imagination, and other ways of relating to the world.²⁶ By doing this, fiction can create what Monica Fludernik (1996, 12) has called “narrative experientiality”: “the quasi-mimetic evocation of real-life experience.” She describes the ways texts solicit readers’ basic experiences of being embodied, intentional, and temporal agents who find meaning and value around them (see Fludernik 1996, 30). Following Fludernik, Marco Caracciolo (2013; 2014a, 46) has conceptualized the experiences evoked in fiction as “story-driven experiences” to underline that the focus is on experiences that are enacted in the process of reading.²⁷ In his model of narrative experientiality, story-driven experiences are brought forth in interaction between the text and the readers’ “experiential background”: their bodily experiences, perceptions, emotions, memories, imagination, and knowledge of socio-cultural practices. Readers, in other words, respond to texts based on their memories of past experiences and their capacities for imagination and mental simulation, and this engagement with texts gives rise to new experiences. (Caracciolo 2014a, 5; 55–73; see also Rosenblatt 1995, xix.)

In this study, I suggest that literary works that portray experiences of shattering and madness from a first-person perspective invite readers to imagine and navigate unsettling experiential worlds.²⁸ The “fictions of madness” construct distressing experiences by manipulating the perspective, temporality, and spatiality of the stories—some of the core elements of narrative. They tap into readers’ basic experiences of having an embodied first-person perspective on the world, a sense of time and space, and a sense of being connected to the world and others, and invite readers into unsettling storyworlds in which these categories of experience are altered. As a result, they do not only create representations of distress, but can also evoke experiences and convey them to their readers.

²⁷ Importantly, this means that readers’ responses can differ significantly from the characters’ experiences portrayed in the text: story-driven experiences are not tied to fictional characters, and many other narrative elements (such as the description of space, time, and objects, the use of metaphors, and the overall mood or style of the text) co-construct story-driven experiences.
²⁸ Note that the “first-person perspective” can be constructed through first-person narration, but also, e.g., through figural third-person narration, which combines the voices and perspectives of the narrator and the character.

However, it is important to emphasize that engaging with fictional texts and the worlds constructed in them always happens inside an aesthetic frame. Even though aesthetic experiences draw on readers’ experiential backgrounds, they have meaning and significance that real-world experience does not have. Reading fictional texts comprises an understanding of their fictionality. Engaging with fiction, the sense of being transported into a storyworld or immersed in the act of reading, is about responding to the text on the basis of one’s bodily, affective, and perceptual experiences and imagination (see Caracciolo 2014a, 58; also Ryan 2002, 98), but also about reflection and ability to distance oneself (see also Rosenblatt 1995, 295; Noë 2015, 58). As Merja Polvinen (2012, 108) puts it: “a crucial part of the experience of fiction is the knowledge that we engage not only with characters and events, but also with an artistic object.” Fictional, artistic narratives not only invite us to inhabit fictional worlds and engage with fictional characters, but also to pay attention to, and become enchanted by, elements like language, words, and style (see Felski 2008, 63). Readers are invited to feel the affective power of narrative texts, but also to reflect on them, their fictionality, their aesthetic significance, and ethical meanings, as we will see.

This understanding of readerly engagement with fictional worlds as simultaneously affective and reflective is in line with James Phelan’s (rhetorical) model of engagement with fictional characters. He has distinguished between characters’ mimetic, synthetic, and thematic functions: they may resemble living beings (mimetic function), but they are nonetheless artificial constructions that have an aesthetic role in the text (synthetic function), and they contribute to the thematic meanings of the text (thematic function) (Phelan 1989, 2–3; 2005, 20; 2013, 171). These functions are always more or less intertwined, and although fictional minds can (and often are) read through our experiential knowledge and psychological frames, they are nonetheless different from actual minds in their structural determination, artificiality, and constructedness. Thus, real-life-based modes and frames of reading are not alone sufficient for explaining their meanings.29

29 See note 11 in the introduction. Some cognitive narratologists might claim that non-psychologizing frames of reading are “real-life based,” which of course they are in a sense (as long as
Whereas cognitive narratology is often interested in the processes of reading and interpretation and in readers’ engagement with fictional worlds and minds, the so-called unnatural narratology has recently emphasized the value of close reading and interpretation of specific literary works and their distinctiveness as fictional texts. As Maria Mäkelä argues, the reader should not be construed “as a mere sense-making machine”—someone who reduces fictional minds to actual human psychology—“but as someone who might just as well opt for the improbable and the indeterminate” (Mäkelä 2013a, 145; also 2013b, 130). Readers have also other desires than simply to create “lifelike” fictional characters and minds. Proponents of unnatural narratology have done important work in stressing that fictional minds can be read, and often are read, in ways that would be unintelligible and impossible in the real world (see Richardson 2006; Alber, Nielsen & Richardson 2010; Iversen 2013a; 2013b; Mäkelä 2013b).

For example, when reading Korpela’s _Tohtori Finckelman_, readers may come to understand that the narrator (who is a psychiatrist) is not only controlling his patients and using the institutional powers of his profession, but his mind actually governs all the other minds in the novel, and the other characters can be read as his projections or his doubles. The novel thus creates a version of what cognitive narratologists would call a “social mind” (Palmer 2010; 2011) which is, however, ontologically impossible and could not exist in the real world, but that is nonetheless important for the aesthetic totality of the literary work. This fictional mind does not follow any rules of nature but thematizes and emphasizes problems in psychiatry and thus has ethical and political meanings. The ontological strangeness or uncanniness of the narrator of _Tohtori Finckelman_ can be explained away (“naturalized” in Jonathan Culler’s terms,

30 In a way, cognitive and unnatural narratology have worked to supplement each another: the former focuses on how literature employs real-life experiences and cognitive frames, the latter emphasizes the artificiality and constructedness of fictional minds and worlds. In a recent dialogue between the two perspectives, Steven Willemsen, Rikke Andersen Kraglund, and Emily Troscianko (2018, 597) illustrate a key difference between cognitive and unnatural narratology regarding interpretation: “scholars in the cognitive camp have tended to treat interpretation as an object of study (i.e., investigating the interpretive process), while those in the unnatural field typically treat it as a method of study (i.e., practicing interpretation in the study of narratives).”

31 On the problems of “unnatural” narratology, starting from the problem of what can be defined as “natural” or “unnatural,” see, e.g., Fludernik 2012; Pettersson 2012.

32 As I discuss in Chapter 3, this interpretation has been suggested by many readers of _Tohtori Finckelman_, e.g., Sarajas 1953/1980, 71–72; Vainio 1975, 179; and Salin 2002, 83.
1975, 138) by diagnosing the narrator as a dissociated or psychotic character, divided into two people, or as an intertextual figure, for example as a rewriting of Stevenson’s Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde. There is no need to stick to one interpretation. Real-world-based folk psychological and folk psychiatric frames may guide readers to interpret the narrator-protagonist as someone who suffers from mental illness, but when reading the text, it becomes clear that the character and its meanings cannot be reduced to psychological interpretations.

In the following, I look more closely at how readers are invited to engage with shattering fictional minds. I move from the simple “diagnostics” of a psychological mode of reading to empathic unsettlement and respectful ethical distance. In practice, these forms of engagement are always intertwined: the same text may invite psychological modes of reading and affective responses at the same time as it invites ethical and aesthetic reflections. I outline some narrative techniques and strategies that authors and texts use to invite responses in readers, but it is important to keep in mind that the effects of specific narrative techniques are always tied to the overall design of the whole work of art and that the responses of actual readers are inevitably different. As Suzanne Keen (2007, 4) writes: “No one text evokes the same responses in all of its readers, and not all texts succeed in stimulating readers to feel and act as their authors apparently wish.” Narrative techniques are protean: no one technique can be bound to any specific effect (see Keen 2007; 98; also Sternberg 1982; Booth 1983).

Diagnostic Efforts

As discussed in the introduction, “madness” is a label that is often used to name what is felt as puzzling, distressing, or unintelligible (also Abbott 2018, 18). The narrators discussed here repeatedly fear that they are going “insane” and categorize their experiences as “mad” to make sense of them. How about readers? How do we end up making psychological and diagnostic readings and interpretations about the narrators and characters?

As narratologists in the cognitive camp often emphasize, readers tend to “attribute” mental states and experiences to characters almost in the same way as we do in real life to actual others.33 Our basic intersubjective skills guide us to perceive fictional characters—who consist of words on a page—as creatures that have experiential worlds, emotions, perceptions, thoughts, and memories. By soliciting our experiential knowledge about actual human beings, texts invite us to view portrayals of characters’ thoughts, speech, actions, and behavior as signs of “inner” experiences. The same applies to the moments in which we encounter portrayals of distress, pain, and shattering: as in real life, so when engaging with fiction, similar phenomena may function as signals of mental distress and guide readers to make psychological or even diagnostic interpretations. Such “folk psychiatric” signals can range from the presentation of alterations in a narrator’s or character’s emotions and perceptions to changes in behavior and interaction with other characters (see Figure 1 below).

---

33 See, e.g., Fludernik 1996, 12; Palmer 2004; Caracciolo 2016, 38. On the attribution of mental illness in narrative fiction, see the special issue of Style (2009), especially the introduction (Bernaerts et al. 2009) and articles on cognitive and rhetorical narratology (on cognitive narratology and madness, see Bernaerts 2009 and Palmer 2009; on rhetorical narratology, see Phelan 2009). On “mad” and “strange” narrators from a cognitive perspective, see also Fludernik 1998 and Caracciolo 2016.

Making psychological interpretations of literary characters is extremely easy. Readers do it almost automatically, and many literary researchers suggest that this is one of the reasons we read fiction: to know how another mind thinks and another body feels (see Cohn 1978, 5–6; also Zunshine 2006). It does not take much to perceive Septimus’s experiences in Woolf’s Mrs Dalloway as signs of trauma and shattering. Or recall the way the narrator of Korpela’s Tohtori Finckelman portrays his experience: “Something has happened, I realize, something that very unpleasantly pushes its way into my life too. It is as if some kind of ropes were pulling my world off its rails, invisible ropes.” It is easy to read this as an account of distress. The longer, more detailed and vivid the narrators’ descriptions, reflections, and reports are, the more readily readers build them into experiential worlds.

Besides reflecting on their own experiences, fictional narrators often make interpretations about other characters. For example, Milka in Mukka’s Tabu understands that her mother is losing her mind from the way she behaves at Milka’s wedding: “We were wed on the second week of November, but my memory has lost the event, I cannot remember it any more. I only remember that mother sat in the church on the first bench, laughing and crying in turns—

---

34 Such intersubjective skills begin developing in early infancy and range from basic affective attunement, mimicry, and mirroring to narrative understanding of others; see, e.g., Stern 1985; Hutto 2007; Gallagher & Zahavi 2012; Colombetti 2014.

35 On “folk psychiatry”, i.e., how we attribute mental disorders to other people based on our tacit understanding of what it means to be a functioning, unified self and an agent, see Boyer 2011. Cognitive and affective signs include lack of emotions, emotional contradictions, heightened negative emotions, loss of memory, hallucinations, and delusions. Linguistic signals consist of phenomena like loss of verbal coherence, loss of words, and loss of grammatical structure. (Ibid.) Such experiences and behavior are likely to be interpreted as signs of pathology because they break our very basic understanding of the self as a single, distinct, integrated body that is the agent of actions, an experiencer of feelings, and can communicate their experiences to others understandably (see also Stern 1985).

36 “On sattunut jotakin, havaitsen, jotakin joka hyvin epämiellyttävästi työntyy minunkin elämääni. Jonkinlaiset köydet ikään kuin kiskovat minunkin maailmaani pois raiteitaan, näkymättömät köydet.” (TF 315.)
that day she lost her mind for good, and her speech and behavior were never again like others.”37 While reflecting on the mental state of her mother, Milka also hints at her own distress as she explains that she cannot remember her wedding. The portrayal of the wedding is preceded by events that many readers are likely to interpret as traumatic, which leads us to read Milka’s own loss of memory as a sign of mental breakdown. The earlier events are why readers immediately understand that Milka’s mother’s cries and laughs in the church should not be interpreted as happy or joyful, but full of distress. Later Milka captures her mother’s shattering in a simple image of her mother combing her hair outside, employing the cultural trope of loose hair as a symbol of madness: “From the window I saw mother combing her hair by the well, she was so insane.”38

As readers of “fictions of madness,” we are invited to take up a similar position to that of Milka: to evaluate the mental states of a fictional character from what we see and hear, how they talk about themselves, behave, and express their experiences, thoughts, and emotions—and we can compare all this to what we understand to be “normal” or “usual.” As such, psychological and diagnostic interpretations depend on each reader’s socio-cultural background, worldview, and cultural situation: whether particular experiences, actions, and behavior are deemed “normal” or “pathological” in a certain time and place. Milka’s interpretation that her mother is insane because she combs her hair by the well is a good example of this: the image employs symbols of female madness that are recognizable only to those who are immersed in the same cultural system. However, although the conceptions of mental illness and madness differ from one culture to another, anthropological research shows that experiences of severe mental distress and suffering are recognized as such in all cultures (see Marrow and Luhrmann 2016).

In other words, it is important to emphasize that folk psychiatric and cultural signals are not alone sufficient to confirm pathologizing interpretations: as in real life, actions and behavior that break norms and defy expectations should not be conceived as signs of disorder or pathology. The experience of merging with the world could just as well be understood as a religious or aesthetic one, and loss of memory could be understood as a result of an otherwise overwhelming situation—people experience gaps in memory all the time. As we have seen already with Woolf and Hämäläinen, distressing and unsettling experiences are often explicitly framed as “mad” or “insane.” The first-person narrators and

---

37 “Marraskuun toisella viikolla meidät vihittiin, mutta muistini on jättänyt minulta pois sen tapahtuman, en enää saa sitä mieleeni. Vain sen muistin, että äiti istui kirkossa ensimmäissessä penkissä nauruen ja itkuen vuorotellen—sinä päivänä sekosi hänen järkensä lopullisesti, eikä hän käytäkseltään ja puheeltaan ollut enää niin kuin muut ihmiset.” (T 100–101.)
38 ”Ikkunasta näin, että äiti kampasi tukkaansa kaivolla, niin mieletön hän oli.” (T 102.)
focalizing characters constantly interpret their own experiences and states of mind: “My God, my God, am I going insane? Everything is muddled, I cannot arrange events in my mind.” 39 Most importantly, just like in real life, experiences that can be understood as forms of psychiatric disability are usually painful experiences: an element of suffering and pain leads either the experiencing characters themselves, other characters around them, or readers to interpret them as illness. 40

Finally, fictional stories about mental distress often refer directly to psychological, psychiatric, and mental health discourses: to diagnostic categories, psychoanalytical terms, notions and forms of psychiatric treatment. In the second half of Tohtori Finckelman, psychiatric disorders become an explicit part of the story as the narrator-protagonist himself ends up working as a psychiatrist. In Kaunis sielu and Likaiset legendat the protagonists are hospitalized. Likaiset legendat even begins with a diagnosis as its motto, “Schizophrenia pseudoneurotica,” thus guiding its readers toward a clinical interpretation. Tabu is the only novel discussed here that contains no explicit references to medical discourses. However, it too refers to lay conceptions of madness and insanity, as the narrator describes the people around her losing their minds and also portrays her own shattering. In addition to medical and folk psychiatric discourses, references to other literary works often guide readers’ interpretations. Readers draw from their previous encounters with fictional minds when reading, and, for example, the narrators discussed in this study have a long tradition of “mad” characters before them, as we will see.

Figure 1 (below) lists these textual signals of mental illness and distress and how they can be located on different levels of the text. Figure 2 shows how these signals may address readers’ experiential background, their experiences and knowledge of the world and literature. The text and its readers are constantly interacting: the texts invite readers to respond, soliciting their experiential background, while readers read and interpret the texts based on their experiential, cultural, and scientific knowledge.

39 “Jumalani, Jumalani, tulenko hulluksi? Kaikki on sekaisin, en voi järjestää tapahtumia mielessäni.” (KS 8.)
40 Like Woolf’s and Hämäläinen’s characters, Mukka’s Milka makes very explicit her fear of going insane: “I was afraid that she had lost her mind, I was afraid that also my own thoughts had lost everything.” (T 72, original at the beginning of the introduction.) Of the narrators discussed in this study, the narrator of Tohtori Finckelman is the only one who refrains (until the second half of the book) from admitting that he has any mental problems, but he too describes experiences of pain and suffering. This becomes clear already on the first pages of the novel by way of negation (a typical technique for the highly unreliable narrator) and description of inexplicable feelings of heaviness and sorrow: “I was not ill in any way, it was otherwise hard. I wonder if other people feel the way I do, I thought then.” (TF 9, original at the beginning of the introduction.)
Figure 1: Textual signals of mental illness and distress

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>TEXTUAL SIGNALS:</th>
<th>EXAMPLES:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>DISCOURSE LEVEL:</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>description and thematization of alterations in embodiment, affectivity, cognition, sense of self and agency, and self-other relations</td>
<td>experiences of bodily alienation; loss of affectivity; emotional contradictions; strong negative emotions; loss of memory; loss of bodily coherence, hallucinations; delusions etc.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>alterations in language and narration</td>
<td>loss of verbal coherence; loss of words; loss of grammatical structure</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>narrator’s evaluations</td>
<td>explicit naming or suspicions of illness</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>STORY LEVEL:</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>traumatic events; diagnostic events</td>
<td>accidents, injuries, violence, loss, deaths; hospitalization; institutionalization</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>INTERTEXTUAL/SOCIO-CULTURAL LEVEL:</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>intertexts, stereotypes</td>
<td>references to other literary characters or psychological/psychiatric discourses</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>psychological and psychiatric discourses</td>
<td>use of diagnostic labels, references to psychological theories, references to psychoanalysis</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Figure 2: Readers’ background and textual signals inviting reader responses

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>READERS’ BACKGROUND:</th>
<th>SIGNALS OF “MADNESS”:</th>
<th>POSSIBLE NARRATIVE TECHNIQUES:</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>READERS’ BODILY, AFFECTIVE, AND COGNITIVE EXPERIENCES, SENSE OF SELFHOOD, AGENCY, AND INTERSUBJECTIVITY</td>
<td>alterations in embodiment, affectivity and cognition; loss of bodily coherence and agency; hallucinations and delusions</td>
<td>description of alterations in space, time and bodily experiences; bodily metaphors; changes of perspective; consciousness presentation (psycho-narration, narrated monologue, quoted monologue); negations; contradictions; gaps</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
READERS’ LINGUISTIC AND NARRATIVE UNDERSTANDING AND KNOWLEDGE

- alterations in linguistic and narrative abilities
- fragmentation, gaps, loss of grammatical or narrative coherence

READERS’ SOCIO-CULTURAL KNOWLEDGE

- traumatic events
- plot structures

READERS’ LITERARY AND CULTURAL KNOWLEDGE

- references to cultural representations of “madness”
- intertextual references allusions, metaphors, symbols, allegories, use of stereotypes and cultural narratives

READERS’ SCIENTIFIC KNOWLEDGE

- references to psychology and psychiatry
- see above

However, as narratologists remind us, fictional texts invite readers to make many different interpretations of their characters besides psychological or diagnostic ones. Fictional characters are always constructions with meanings that go beyond psychological insights. Texts often thematize this constructedness, for example through characters who try to figure out the minds of other characters (like the narrator of Kaunis sielu or Milka in Tabu), or characters who experience themselves as artificial creatures (as in Tohtori Finckelman). Throughout my readings, I aim to show that these perspectives—fictional mind as a literary construction; texts evoking experientiality and lifelikeness—do not need to be seen as conflicting. It is possible to emphasize both the constructed nature of fictional minds and the affective and bodily meanings that arise in the interaction between the reader and the text. The stories invite readers to feel with the characters and to navigate the storyworlds, but at the same time their significance cannot be reduced to real-life experience and psychological frames of reading. It is possible to have both a sense of immersion in the fictional reality and an understanding that it is an aesthetic, artificial construction.

This is a recurrent theme in modernist novels: an effort is made to capture what it feels like to go through experiences of distress and illness, but the texts are also ambiguous and self-reflexive, and a metafictional understanding of the artificiality of the fictional minds is often a built-in feature in the texts. For example, Kaunis sielu and Tohtori Finckelman evoke affective experiences of shattering minds, but they are as much about the possibilities of artistic creation and the failures of language and communication as they are about conveying experiences of “madness” or constructing psychologically convincing mental worlds, as we will see. This self-reflexive emphasis on questions of communication and problems of conveying experiences also pushes readers to take an ethical distance from the narrators and characters and to reflect on the problem of “knowing” other minds.

Empathy and Ethical Distance

Many narratologists have emphasized the ethical and aesthetical importance of interpretative strategies that leave the strange and unfamiliar fictional minds “as they are” (see Abbott 2008; 2013; Iversen 2013a & b; Mäkelä 2013a). Porter Abbot has written about “unreadable minds” that prevent us from reading them through labels like “madness.” As he puts it, there are texts “that work best when we allow ourselves to rest in that peculiar combination of anxiety and wonder that is aroused when an unreadable mind is accepted as unreadable.” (Abbott 2008, 448.) The unreadable characters remind us that it is not always necessary to find psychological explanations for phenomena that appear strange. It is possible, and often necessary, for a reader to encounter a mind that breaks psychological frames without pathologizing or categorizing it. Different psychological and diagnostic interpretations are often interrupted in fictional texts: we are prevented from understanding the characters through psychological frames—and the characters fail to understand one another.41

The notion of unreadability—and the call for readers to allow themselves to rest in the “anxiety and wonder” raised by minds that cannot be known—resonates with LaCapra’s notion of empathic unsettlement (see introduction) as well as with phenomenological views of empathy. For LaCapra and for phenomenologists, empathy is a form of perceiving and acknowledging the experience of another while understanding the difference between the self and the other. As Matthew Ratcliffe notes: “[E]mpathy is not—contrary to popular belief—a matter of ‘simulating’ another person’s experience. It involves being open to varying degrees and kinds of interpersonal difference, rather than attempting to eliminate those differences by experiencing what the other person experiences in the same way that she does.” (Ratcliffe 2015, 230.) Empathy is thus not about sharing experiences in the sense of having or imagining having the same experience as another being. This would create what narrative theorist Amy Shuman (2005) has described as a false sense of closeness. Rather, in the phenomenological sense, empathy refers to our ability to recognize the experience of the other as other and to feel with the other while understanding their difference from ourselves. As such, phenomenologists have described empathy as a form of perception directed toward the other: I perceive the experience of the other and I understand it to be theirs. Empathy is thus understood as a kind of attentiveness to another, recognition of the other and their difference from the self. As Merleau-Ponty (2002, 415) writes: “For me these situations are displayed, for him they are lived through.” Or as Shaun Gallagher and Dan Zahavi (2012, 204) note, following Husserl: “If I had the same access to the consciousness of the other as I have to my own, the other would cease being an other and would instead become a part of myself.”

---

41 The human tendency to imagine, interpret and narrativize other minds, as well as the failures in understanding others, are a constant theme in (modernist) fiction, as many researchers from different narratological perspectives have emphasized (see Palmer 2004, 163; Zunshine 2008; Mäkelä 2011, 13; Nykänen 2014, 13).

Furthermore, Gallagher and Zahavi emphasize that we often understand one another through the worlds we share: “[T]o understand other persons I do not primarily have to get into their minds; rather, I have to pay attention to the world I already share with them.” (Gallagher & Zahavi 2012, 213.) They particularly underscore our capacities for narrative understanding:

I encounter the other person, not abstracted from their circumstances, but in the middle of something that has a beginning and that is going somewhere. I see them in the framework of a story in which either I have a part to play or I don’t. The narrative is not primarily about what is ‘going on inside their heads’: it’s about what is going on in our shared world and about how they understand and respond to it. (Gallagher & Zahavi 2012, 215.)

Such narrative competence about the world is developed as we grow and learn more about the world and one another, and it makes possible the understanding between the self and the other without having to “read” each other’s minds (see also Gallagher 2007; Hutto 2007).

In other words, rather than “simulating” others’ experience, what becomes important is the encountering of another being as a person: “Empathy at least involves recognizing another person as a locus of experience and agency.”

42 Likewise, the enactivist views on intersubjectivity emphasize that understanding the other is interactive: we both remain autonomous, separate beings, but are affected by the other, and something new emerges as a result (see de Jaegher & di Paolo 2007).

43 As Ratcliffe describes, following Dan Zahavi’s (2014) work on empathy: “Empathizing is comparable to ‘perceiving’, ‘remembering’, and ‘believing’; it is a type of intentional state in its own right, a second-person experience of mental states that differs in kind from first-person experience. […] When we perceive the behavior of others, we experience something of their experience in their behavior. In doing so, we continue to encounter that experience as theirs, and this in a different way to how we would if it were our own.” (Ratcliffe 2015, 232.)
Fictions of Madness

(Ratcliffe 2015, 233–234.) Such minimal empathy also means an understanding of the fact that we are unable to experience another person’s experience in a first-person way: “A more profound failure of empathy [...] is when you fail to recognize that there is a difference.” (Ratcliffe 2015, 240.) Empathy thus can be characterized as a mode of being attuned to another being, appreciating the difference of another. This kind of reflective empathy maintains an ethical distance from the other. Likewise, many literary and narrative theorists have emphasized this kind of empathy: for example, Doris Sommer has paid attention to the techniques fictional narratives use to remind readers of the difference between the self and the other, and to keep them engaged with difference (Sommer 1999; see also Coplan 2004, 143; Shuman 2011; Meretoja 2018, 113; 232–234).

To sum up: when engaging with fictional minds, we respond to text based on 1) our experiential background—our understanding of being embodied agents embedded in the world, and our folk psychological and cultural frames of reference; 2) our knowledge about the world, literature (intertextuality, genres, etc.), and scientific discourses. Even though we initially read fictional characters based on our own bodily and affective responses and common psychological and cultural frames, often the texts 3) force us to let the unfamiliar, the strange and the unsettling puzzle us. We are invited to give up our labeling and categorizing tendencies, and rather let the literary text modify our understanding, experiences, and views. This leads me to the final topic of this theoretical survey: what kind of cultural work do “fictions of madness” do?

1.3. What Fictions of Madness Do

It is a commonplace in literary studies and philosophy of art to state that literary fiction defamiliarizes us from our ordinary experiences and ways of conceiving the world. This is often a more important function of literature than the evocation of lifelikeness, as both cognitively oriented and other narrative researchers agree. Fiction tests our affective and cognitive skills; it disrupts and problematizes our conceptions of the mind and consciousness. It pushes the limits of our imagination so that the world and even our own experiences are revealed to us in a new light.

---

44 The phenomenological notion of empathy differs from Suzanne Keen’s (2007, 4; 2013, #1) influential definition of “narrative empathy” as “the sharing of feeling or perspective taking induced by reading, viewing, or imagining narratives of another’s situation and condition.” Keen’s definition and her use of the word “share” does not make explicit the difference between my own and the other’s experience. For recent narratological discussions on narrative empathy which pay more attention to the difference between the self and the other, see Hammond & Kim 2014; McGlathlin 2016. Like Keen, I use the word “share” in the analyses, but this is not to imply that the experiences would be the same; there is always a difference between my own and other’s experience, even when the experience is shared.
While acknowledging the readers’ tendency to draw on real-life frames and their folk psychological skills when reading fiction (Fludernik 1996, 12; Caracciolo 2016, 38), it is also important to consider how fictional minds disrupt the intuitive and folk psychological ways we think about the mind and consciousness. This is recognized also in cognitive narratology. As Caracciolo (2014b, 43) suggests: “Some texts invite readers to empathize with minds radically different from ours, providing them with a disconcerting experience that challenges their core assumptions (including their folk psychology) and conventions.” Engaging with fictional minds that seem very different from ours can change our personal and culturally determined notions about the mind, as well as our understanding about experiences of mental distress and illness. Moreover, as Emily Troscianko (2014, 343) suggests in her reading of Kafka, some texts are evocative precisely because they disrupt our folk psychological thinking while tapping into the ways things actually are in our experience (see also Palmer 2004, 245). Such texts solicit the readers’ embodied being in the world and challenge, for example, the dualistic notion that the mind is separated from the body, emphasizing the embodied and relational nature of the mind. And as Lars Bernaerts (2009, 384) has underlined in his research on “mad” characters and narrators, the experiences evoked in literature never fully correspond to pathological labels and diagnostic categories. While fictional texts often invite readers to employ psychological and pathological frames of interpretation, fiction also challenges them by reminding us of the complexity of experiences. As such, literary portrayals of mental illness and distress can participate in negotiating new ways of thinking about the mind, consciousness, and the diagnostic categories of mental illness, and they can also push the boundaries of what is considered normal or abnormal.

In other words, fiction may help us to create new ways of understanding the mind and experiences: the relationship between the mind, the body, and the world, the experiences of mental distress and illness, and the borders between “normal” and “abnormal.” Furthermore, fictional minds are always constructions that are created in a particular historical situation, and the representations of mental distress and shattering always shed light on the ways minds, consciousness and mental illnesses are understood in a certain time and place. They not only employ and challenge the way we understand experiences, but also our concepts of the mind, folk psychological notions as well as diagnostic categories and classifications.

To take one step further: philosopher Ian Hacking (1998; 1999) has emphasized the looping effects between classifications and people who are being classified. Being diagnosed, for example, with schizophrenia, affects the way a person understands themselves and the way they experience. Because “fictions of madness” employ, repeat, and reconfigure categories of mental illness, they may shape not only readers’ conceptions thereof, but even the experiences that readers who suffer from psychiatric disabilities have. Similarly, in hermeneutic literary studies, Hanna Meretoja (2018) has recently paid attention to how fictional and nonfictional narratives shape the ways we experience. Narratives—including fictional representations of minds—have the power to expand or diminish our sense of the possible: “Narratives can contribute to our sense of how to live in a historical world (including our own) is to live in a particular space of possibilities in which it is possible to experience, perceive, think, feel, do, and imagine certain things, and difficult or impossible to experience, perceive, think, feel, do, and imagine other things.” (Meretoja 2018, 16.) “Fictions of madness” can guide us to reflect on the possibilities available for people suffering from mental illness, as well as on the ways experiences of shattering are tied to the loss of possibilities in the world, as discussed above.

As discussed in this chapter, the embodied view of reading emphasizes the role of readers as bodily agents embedded in the world, engaging with the texts based on their experiential background and their particular historical and cultural situation. The understanding of reading as an embodied process helps us to pay attention to the ways both readers and texts are shaped by their environments, societies, and cultures, and most importantly, how different kinds of bodies are situated differently in the world. When we read the painful stories of others, we need to look at the possibilities for action created in them, the ways the stories structure and shape experiences, and the possibilities offered in them.

Similar ideas have been developed also in New Formalist discussions in recent years. For a long time, narratology has been accused of being unhistorical, universalizing, and uncontextual, but in recent years narratologists have started to pay more attention to the ways different cultural and political forms are carried out or challenged in narratives. As Greta Olson and Sarah Copland note, there is a need to look at “how structures of social power are expressed in and by, as well as challenged, by aesthetic forms” and a need to “to politicize narratological and formal analysis” (Olson & Copland 2016, 207). For example, Caroline Levine has urged researchers to look at the cultural and political work that literary and social forms do in particular historical contexts. Through narratives, we can see how different social forms, hierarchies of power, ideologies, and aesthetic forms collide, and challenge, maintain, or reproduce one another. In her view, narratives examine how we are shaped by these forms: “political forms impose their order on our lives”; they “are everywhere structuring and patterning experience” (Levine 2015, 16; 19). Furthermore, the New Formalist perspective reminds us of how also reading carries out political forms. We thus need to understand reading as both embodied and political; that is, to be aware of the structures that shape us. When we read, we need to attune to stories told by others, as well as to the political and cultural forms that are maintained or challenged in narratives.45

The literary analyses that follow aim to deepen these discussions to the level that is most important and interesting when talking about literature: reading and interpreting specific texts. The kind of knowledge and understanding that fiction creates, the cultural work fiction does, and the affective, aesthetical and ethical meanings it has are always dependent on individual texts: each text does its work in its own way. Before turning to the analyses, I briefly summarize the four novels and discuss how they are situated in Finnish literary history and in previous research.

1.4. Finnish Modernism: A Closer Look on the Novels

In Finnish literary history, the term “modernism” is sometimes used in a very strict sense, referring to the literary developments of the 1950s and early 1960s, which is also when Jorma Korpela and Timo K. Mukka published their works. As such modernism is a “late phenomenon” in Finnish literature (see Riikonen 2007, 847, 852). However, Finnish writers started to develop new perspectives on the mind, the self, and the subject’s relation to the world starting from the 1890s, much like other European and American authors. The early modernists visited European centers of innovative literary experimentation and were in dialogue with their colleagues abroad. Examples of central new texts and theories were also translated in literary magazines throughout the first decades of the twentieth century. In the 1920s, groups such as Tulenkantajat (1924–30, the Flame Bearers), Nuoren Voiman Liitto (1920–, the Association of the Young Force) and Sinisten kerho (1926–1929, The Blue Club) discussed new literary trends and explored vitalistic and psychoanalytical ideas about the self, the psyche, and the unconscious. (See Riikonen 2007, 847–848; Ihanus 1994; Koivisto 2011.) In the 1930s, leftist literary group Küla (1936–) continued discussions about subjectivity and sexuality, and writers like Helvi Hämäläinen and Iiris Uurto examined questions of female sexuality, motherhood, equality, and social justice in their works (see Koivisto 2011; Juutila 2012). At the same time, male writers Volter Kilpi and Joel Lehtonen wrote experimental novels which were widely acclaimed (and criticized) as modernist. In the 1940s, many French, British, American, and German modernist and existentialist authors (Joyce, Kafka, Camus, Sartre, Hemingway, Faulkner) were translated into Finnish, creating a background for the formal developments and thematic questions of the 1950s and 1960s (see Riikonen 2007, 851).

45 This kind of embodied, yet political practice of (close) reading has been emphasized also in narrative medicine in recent years, see Charon 2016a&b.

The novels discussed in this study are rare, yet important examples of the first-person narrative form in Finnish literature from the late 1920s to the early 1970s. The writers created affective languages and narratives which are both evocative and unsettling, aesthetic and lifelike. Their works emphasize both their own (meta)fictionality and constructedness, and invite readers’ affective and bodily responses. The first-person form highlights the subjective and the fallible, and it is closely connected to thematic questions of selfhood, self-narration, and self-reflection, to discussions about the borders between fiction and reality (and fictional and real minds), and to ethical questions about understanding others and empathy. The chosen texts develop themes that are familiar from other European and American modernist and late modernist works: the margins of subjectivity and the boundaries between the self and the world, undecidability and ambiguity, as well as the representation of bodily sensations, thoughts, memory, imagination, affectivity, gender, and sexuality that were cited above. The analyses of the following chapters thus illuminate one less-researched facet of modernism in Finland. Further, they create new interpretations of texts that have not been extensively studied before (\textit{Kaunis sielu} and \textit{Likaiset legendat}) and offer completely new perspectives on others (\textit{Tohtori Finckelman} and \textit{Tabu}).

The novels discussed here are not, however, the only examples of portrayals of mental distress and shattering in the Finnish modernist tradition. Researchers have touched upon the meanings of madness and mental illness in decadent and early modernist literature of the 1900s, for example, in L. Onerva’s, Maria Jotuni’s, and Joel Lehtonen’s works (see Lyytikäinen 1997; 2014; Rossi 2010; 2011; Ahmala 2016). This study also builds on feminist scholarship on the ways writers like Onerva, Aino Kallas, Elsa Heporauta, Elsa Soini, and Iiris Uurto experimented with the narrative form and portrayed gender, sexuality, and social constraints in the 1920s and 1930s (see Hapuli, Koivunen, Lappalainen & Rojola 1992; Juutila 1999; 2012; Melkas 2006; Lappalainen & Rojola 2007; Parente-Čapková 2014; Tuohela & Hapuli 2015).

After the Second World War, Finnish modernism is often divided into two main strands, the “behaviorist-objectivist” strand which aimed at emotional restraint and precision of language and form, and the “existentialist-subjective” 46 For an introduction to Finnish modernism from the 1890s to the 1970s, see Riikonen 2007. On the early views on psychoanalysis in Finland, see Ihanus 1994, 228–232. See also Nykänen 2014, 36–44; 51; 2017, 13–19 for an introduction to Finnish 1950s and 1960s modernism.

---

47 As the first Finnish “mental asylum novel,” Kirs Tuohela and Ritva Hapuli name Elsa Heporauta’s \textit{Suuri yö} (The Great Night, 1933), see Tuohela & Hapuli 2015, 159–163. Another work which deals very explicitly with the topic of mental illness and shattering in the 1930s is Uuno Kailas’s \textit{Novellit} (Short Stories, 1936).
strand to which Korpela’s psychological, affective, and self-reflexive works are connected. In addition to Korpela’s and Mukka’s novels, evocative portrayals of mental illness and shattering can be found in the 1950s and 1960s works of, for example, Eeva-Liisa Manner, Marko Tapio, Kerttu-Kaarina Suosalmi, Marja-Liisa Vartio, and Tove Jansson (see also Makkonen 1991; 1992; Nykänen 2017; 2018).48 Until the late 1960s, the portrayals of mental illness in Finnish literature were mostly fictional or fictionalized. However, the early 1970s saw the rise of autobiographical novels, memoirs, and illness narratives (for example, in the works of Christer Kihlman and Eeva Kilpi), and Maria Vaara’s novels can be linked to this new emergence of autofiction and life writing. The 1970s can also be seen as a period of transition from (late) modernism to postmodernism.49

Experiences of mental shattering, distress and illness are a recurring theme in Finnish literature—as they are internationally—and this is often registered in research on specific authors and in literary historical surveys. The present research is, however, the first extensive study on these topics in Finnish modernism. It is also the first study in which several Finnish modernist writers and their works are brought together and introduced to an English-speaking audience. This is why the analysis chapters include a large number of textual examples and passages that I have translated into English for the first time. Let us now take a brief look at the novels, their contexts, and prior research on them.

48 Good examples of portrayals of mental illness and distress from the 1950s and 1960s are, e.g., Eeva-Liisa Manner’s Tyttö taivaan laiturilla (1951, transl. Girl on Heaven’s Pier, 2016), Marko Tapio’s Aapo Heiskasen viikatetanssi (Aapo Heiskanen’s Scythe Dance, 1956), Kerttu-Kaarina Suosalmi’s “Synti” (“The Sin”, 1957) (which is also a rare example of a first-person narrative), Marja Luisa Vartio’s Kaikki naiset näkevät unia (All Women Dream, 1960) and Hänens olivat linnut (1967, transl. The Parson’s Widow, 2008), Tove Jansson’s Pappan och Havet (1963, transl. Moominpappa at Sea, 1974), and Anu Kaipainen’s Magdaleena ja maailman lapsi (Magdalene and the World’s Children, 1969). For an analysis of Tapio’s works, see Makkonen 1992; on Vartio and Suosalmi, see Nykänen 2017; 2018; on Kaipainen, see Tuoheła & Hapuli 2015, 166–171.

49 Considering the years of publication, Tabu (1965) and Likaiset legendat (1974) could be characterized as examples of Finnish late modernism, approaching postmodernism. However, if we follow McHale’s (1987) distinction according to which modernist texts focused on epistemological questions (about how we can gain knowledge about reality) and postmodernist texts on ontological questions (about the very existence of reality), as well as Waugh’s (1984) description of postmodernist metafiction as an exploration of the constructedness of reality, then Kaunis sielu (1928/2001) and Tohtori Finckelman (1952), which are more self-conscious of their status as artefacts and in which the status of reality is more uncertain, appear even more “postmodernist” than Tabu and Likaiset legendat. In other words, Tabu and Likaiset legendat are closer to postmodernism chronologically but Kaunis sielu and Tohtori Finckelman are more “postmodern” in the questions they pose. The four texts thus vividly show that the distinctions between modernism and postmodernism are not clear-cut.
The Beautiful Soul

Helvi Hämäläinen (1907–1998) wrote her first novel Kaunis sielu (The Beautiful Soul) during the winter and spring of 1927–28 when she was 20 years old. As an emerging writer in the late 1920s, she participated in the new literary groups which were founded in Helsinki and became familiar with the modernist ideas promoted in their magazines. In the novel, she develops new narrative techniques and experiments with the monologue and diary forms, but since the manuscript was not published until 2001, its norm-breaking form and content stayed hidden from literary historians for a long time. Between the writing of Kaunis sielu and its publication, Hämäläinen became one of Finland’s most prolific and well-known authors, and during her long career from the early 1930s until the 1990s she published over thirty novels, plays, and collections of poetry.

The exact reasons why Kaunis sielu was not initially accepted for publication can only be speculated, but as Katri Kivilaakso and Alexandra Stang have argued in their works on queer topics in Finnish literature, and as Hämäläinen herself suspected, the theme of same-sex desire was likely the main one (Kivilaakso 2012, 151–155; Stang 2015, 225–230; 239; see also Haavikko & Hämäläinen 1993, 93). In a series of interviews in the 1970s and in her memoir, Hämäläinen recollected that the content of the manuscript shocked the men working at a publishing house to which she offered the text. She describes a strange atmosphere when she was picking it up: “I remember a disconcerting feeling arising in me because the men were looking at me so queerly. I began to understand that something was wrong.” After having debuted as an author with another novel, Hämäläinen offered the manuscript to different publishing houses, but eventually gave up the effort. In the memoir, Hämäläinen reminisces (though quite vaguely) that the novel depicted a “tragedy,” a woman

---

50 E.g., Hämäläinen wrote for Tulenkantajat (1924–30), Nuori Voima (1908–), and Sininen kirja (1926–1929), see Hämäläinen & Haavikko 1993, 85–86; 94–99.
51 “[M]uistan, että minussa syntyi hämmentävä tunne, sillä miehet katselivat minua aika omituisesti. Aloin ymmärtää, että jokin oli vinossa.” (Quoted in Stang 2015, 225.) The same statement with a slightly different wording is printed in Hämäläinen’s memoir: “I remember a disconcerting feeling arising in me when the men stared at me silently and queerly for a long time.” (“Muistan, että minussa syntyi hämmentävä tunne, kun miehet vaiti tuijottivat minua pitkään ja omituisesti.”) (Haavikko & Hämäläinen 1993, 93).
52 See also Stang (2015, 230) who quotes also an unpublished, undated interview in which Hämäläinen says that she “ran with it [the manuscript] from one publisher to the next, and no one took it, and that was namely because its topic was such an odd one as lesbianism. You understand, of course, that at this time such a topic was not published.” In her memoir, Hämäläinen recollects that after she had already become a writer, she offered Kaunis sielu as part of a short story collection in 1931 to her publisher WSOY, where editor Elsa Enäjärvi-Haavio read it but did not support the publication. Later in 1939 Hämäläinen was encouraged by writer Olavi Paavolainen (who was her partner at the time) to offer it once more, but at this point she declined herself. (Haavikko & Hämäläinen 1993, 126; 291.) Hämäläinen’s first novel Hyväntekijä (The Benefactor) was published by WSOY in late 1930. Interestingly, it was celebrated by editor Martti Haavio (who was Enäjärvi-Haavio’s husband) as a breakthrough shooting her male lover, as well as an erotic relationship between women, but claims that she did not know anything about homosexuality when she wrote the text (Haavikko & Hämäläinen 1993, 93; also Juutila 1989, 425; Stang 2015, 229–230).

The manuscript was ultimately hidden in Hämäläinen’s personal archives from the late 1930s until the late 1990s. Finally, in 2001—73 years after the text was written and two years after the author’s death—Hämäläinen’s long-time publisher began a series of her previously unpublished manuscripts and the novel was released in print. If Kaunis sielu had been published at the time of writing, it would have joined other transgressive portrayals of gender and sexuality of the late 1920s, like Radclyffe Hall’s Well of Loneliness (1928) and Woolf’s Orlando (1928) (see also Stang 2015, 224; Kivilaakso 2012, 151). The difference is, however, that the novel is to some extent unfinished and the motif of homosexuality, though explicit in the text, is developed only fragmentarily.

The novel consists of 106 short sections or fragments which can be interpreted as parts of a diary or a written confession, and it is unclear to what extent of Finnish modernism, as he wrote to Hämäläinen: “You really have all the chances. ‘The Benefactor’ is, this is how I see it, the first modern Finnish novel; I am looking forward curiously to the reviews.” (“Teillä todellakin on kaikki mahdollisuudet. ‘Hyväntekijä’ on, niin käsitan, ensimmäinen suomalainen moderni romaani; odotan uteliaana arvostelun suhtautumista.”) (Hämäläinen & Haavikko 1993, 105.) Formally and thematically, however, Hyväntekijä is much more conventional than Kaunis sielu: in it, an extradiegetic narrator tells the story of a male protagonist who, like the narrator of Kaunis sielu, is guided by aesthetic experiences of art and nature and who struggles between his desire to help people, his love of art, and his profession as a factory owner, as well as between selfish and unselfish reasons to do good deeds. Elsa Enäjärvi-Haavio was not as excited about Hyväntekijä as her husband, writing to him before the publication: “WSOY 20.10.1930. Jäntti [the publisher] brought Helvi Hämäläinen’s manuscript once more for me to read. But it has no form, it is pure poetry! We should make her write poems instead. The critics wouldn’t have time to read this in the middle of the Christmas rush. But if we won’t publish it, who knows if H. H. will jump into the Porvoo river. (“WSOY 20.10.1930. Jäntti toi Helvi Hämäläisen käsikirjoituksen vielä kerran luettavaksi. Mutta sehän on aivan muodoton, pelkkää lyrikkää. Ihminen olisi pantava runon ja kirjoittamaan. Tätä eivät arvostelijat varmaankaan jaksaisi joulukiireissä lukua. Mutta jos sitä ei julkista, kuka tietää vaikka H.H. hyppäisi Porvoon jokeen.”) (Quoted in Enäjärvi-Haavio & Eskola 2000, 187.)

On the inconsistencies and silences in Hämäläinen’s own statements about the topic of homosexuality in Kaunis sielu and the whereabouts of the manuscript before its publication, see Kivilaakso 2012; Stang 2015, 227–229. Kivilaakso suggests, and Stang agrees, that Hämäläinen likely wanted to control what was known about the manuscript in public and that the text was probably never actually missing. There is an interesting tension: on the one hand, she talked about the manuscript in interviews and made sure that its existence was documented; on the other hand, she claimed that it was lost. Ultimately Hämäläinen gave permission to publish the text in 1996 and it came out posthumously in 2001 (see Kivilaakso 2012, 155). As Kivilaakso (ibid.) notes, Hämäläinen’s diaries will be opened for research in 2023 and they will hopefully illuminate the writing process of Kaunis sielu.

For an analysis of the queer topics in Kaunis sielu, see Stang 2015, 233–239. I discuss the questions of queer shame and pleasure in 2.3.
the fragmentariness and repetitiveness of the text is intended by the author or caused by lack of editing. An apparent model for the narrative situation (and the narrator) is Dostoyevsky’s Notes from the Underground (1864)—with the exception that the narrator is female and Hämäläinen seems to aim for an even more evocative and detailed description of mental processes, affects, and emotions. The themes of crime and guilt seem to be, in turn, borrowed from The Crime and Punishment (1866). In the novel, an unnamed narrator tells an (imagined) audience that she is in an adulterous relationship with a man whom she has started to hate, and states that she must murder him. The narration moves forward almost simultaneously with the events: the narrator often explains what has just happened or what she is experiencing at the moment of narration. In the first chapters, she plans the murder but fails to go through with it because the man travels away. In the middle part, she recounts how she and the man later met at a cemetery, how she shot him and then turned herself in at a hospital from where she describes the murder. In the following fragments, she tells her readers that she has been released (quite strangely) because she is considered insane, and recounts how she moves to a working-class district in Helsinki, first to a beautiful clean apartment, then purposely to a place covered with filth among alcoholics and prostitutes. In the final chapters, she walks around the city, contemplates her motives for the murder and suffers from guilt but also goes through experiences of aesthetic pleasure and wonder. She describes her dreams, imaginings, and hallucinations and reports how she plays with her fantasies. She repeatedly insists that she can separate reality from hallucination, but at the same time suspects that she is going insane. In the end, she dies of a lung disease (as the readers can infer), and just before her death, she envisions the figure of Christ approaching her.

From a twenty-first-century reader’s perspective, Kaunis sielu is an intriguing example of late 1920s experimental writing, situated between and drawing influences from different literary movements and periods. Hämäläinen crafts a detailed description of bodily sensations, feelings of guilt, shame, love, and wonder, associations, perceptions, memories, fantasies, and hallucinations, creating a modernist language and form and even anticipating existentialist literature. At the same time, the text is a transgressive portrayal of gender, sexuality, and a “madwoman’s” possibilities for self-expression and artistic creation in late 1920s Helsinki.

---

55 Kaunis sielu interestingly resonates with later existentialist texts like Camus’ L’Étranger (1942) and Keritu-Kaarina Suosalmi’s “Synti” (1957) which is likewise narrated by a female protagonist who suffers from mental distress and goes through experiences of guilt and shame. The anticipation of existentialist topics is likely a result of Hämäläinen’s interest in Dostoyevsky and her efforts to develop Dostoyevskyan themes of crime, guilt and responsibility in a new form. On the connections and differences between Dostoyevsky and existentialism, see, e.g., Bernstein 1992, see also 3.2. I thank Elise Nykänen for bringing Suosalmi’s short story to my attention and Sari Salin for pointing out the connections between the narrator of Kaunis sielu and the Dostoyevskyan abject heroes and heroines.

In addition to the late nineteenth and the early twentieth century topics, an influence of romanticist thinking is visible in the narrator’s affective discourse and the intertexts evoked in the novel. In her memoir, Hämäläinen explains that while writing Kaunis sielu—“the beautiful soul”\(^\text{56}\)—she had a strong interest in aesthetic experiences and feelings of “beauty” and “goodness”:

I was controlled by an aesthetic worldview. My mind had not opened itself to any social feelings or views, although there would have been a lot of material around me. But in my dark cellar room I went through passionate poetic experiences and wrote about beauty and goodness. I was deeply affected by a strong love for, and sense of, beauty.\(^\text{57}\)

Hämäläinen was inspired by German and English romantics like Goethe, Schiller, and Shelley (see Haavikko & Hämäläinen, 83–84; 657), and the influence of the romantic portrayals of nature, beauty, and enchantment can be traced in her works throughout her career, as Marjut Kähkönen (2004) has shown in her study on Hämäläinen’s poetry. Yet, the kind of “virtuous” aestheticism recollected by Hämäläinen in her memoir and suggested in the title of Kaunis sielu is strongly contrasted with the negative and unsettling experiences which are constantly foregrounded in the text: the novel is filled with naturalist and decadent motifs of degeneration, illness and madness.\(^\text{58}\) Moreover, although Hämäläinen denies that she would have been able to discuss any “social views,” the novel itself raises multiple social, political and ethical questions, starting from the description of same-sex desire and the motifs of adultery and murder (see also Stang 2015, 232).

The text thus offers several different interpretive frames for the narrator and her self-declared “madness”: romantic and aesthetic madness, naturalist degeneration, the Dostoyevskian abject hero, the madwoman of the late nineteenth century, the femme fatale or “New Woman” of the 1920s, and a psychoanalytical subject governed by unconscious drives and instincts. When read considering the novel’s main themes and motifs, the narrator’s madness can be seen as a \(^{56}\) The title refers to the neoclassical/romantic concept of the “beautiful soul,” die schöne Seele, a soul that has found harmony through aesthetic education (see Norton 1995). But although the “soul” constructed in the novel is constantly looking for aesthetic experiences and goes through feelings of aesthetic beauty and wonder, one could not claim that it reaches any kind of “harmony.”

\(^{57}\) “Minä olin tuohon aikaan esteettisen maailmankatsomuksen vanki. Millekään sosiaaliselle tunteelle tai näkemykselle ei mieleni ollut avautunut, vaikka ympärilläni olisi ollut runsaasti siihen aineksia, mutta synkässä kellarihuoneessa minä koin hurmautuneita runoelämyksiä ja kirjoitin kauneudesta ja hyvyydestä. Minussa vaikutti äärettömän voimakas kauneudenrakkaus ja kauneudentaju.” (Haavikko & Hämäläinen 1993, 93.)

\(^{58}\) On decadence and its connections to (mental) illness in Finnish literature, see Lyytikäinen 1997, 12; 2014.
metaphor for a (failed) female rebellion against oppressive social norms—much like Charlotte Perkins Gilman’s The Yellow Wall-Paper (1892) or Kate Chopin’s The Awakening (1899). As such, Kaunis sielu develops and modifies the madwoman motif and connects it to the early twentieth-century psychological and psychoanalytical discussions about the self, the mind, and sexuality.

In Finland, late 1920s and early 1930s literature was characterized by a growing interest in unconscious drives and forces. Psychoanalytical influences became more and more visible in fiction, and although Freud’s theories were not known very thoroughly, the main ideas of psychoanalysis were used, for example, to discuss female sexuality and to rebel against Christian-Conservative norms. Kaunis sielu anticipates these discussions, but without creating any direct or coherent connection to psychoanalytical thinking. Rather, the idea of the unconscious is brought forth through the narrator’s self-reflections as she recognizes that there are experiences that she cannot understand or verbalize.

Representations of sexuality and discussions about sexual drives raised vivid debates about the morals of literature in Finland in the mid-1930s, and Hämäläinen’s later novels Lumous (The Enchantment, 1934) and Katuojan vettä (The Gutter Water, 1935) were among the debated works. Later in her career, Hämäläinen continued to examine questions of female sexuality and desire, and she became famous for her novel Säädyllinen murhenäytelmä (A Decent Tragedy, 1941) which depicts the life of cultural circles in Helsinki before the Second World War and caused scandals because of its representations of recognizable Finnish cultural figures. However, Kaunis sielu remains Hämäläinen’s most experimental work, which so far has not received enough critical attention.

Doctor Finckelman

If Kaunis sielu is a short, fragmentary text which was rejected by its first readers in a very concrete way, Jorma Korpela’s (1910–1964) Tohtori Finckelman (1952) is a meticulously crafted complex novel which, as soon as it was published, was considered to be one of the most important examples of Finnish postwar literature. Tohtori Finckelman was Korpela’s second novel, and from

---

59 The first more comprehensive Finnish introduction to psychoanalysis was Yrjö Kulovesi’s Psykoanalyysi ( Psychoanalysis, 1933). On psychoanalysis in Finland and in Finnish literature in the 1920s and 1930s, see Ihanus 1994; 1999; Koivisto 2011, 234; Juutila 1999, 373.
60 Hämäläinen discusses the reception of her works in her memoir, see Haavikko & Hämäläinen 1993, 174. On the moral debates of the 1930s, see Lappalainen 1999, 324–325.
61 The first edition of Säädyllinen murhenäytelmä was partly censored in 1941 (the descriptions of homosexuality were removed) and the full novel was not published until 1995 (see also Stang 2015, 223).
62 See, e.g., Karhu 1977, 109. Though Salin (2002, 25) also notes that Korpela himself seems to have been disappointed with the reception, and he decided to return to a more conventional narrative form after Tohtori Finckelman.

today’s perspective, Korpela can be seen as the prime representative of existentialist modernism. His works are often connected to the modernist innovations of the decade as an author focusing on the self, the psyche, and personal ethics, in contrast to writers who have been characterized as aiming for “objectivity” and “emotional restraint” (see Makkonen 1992, 95; Hölkkä 1999, 71). In his literary history, Kai Laitinen (1997, 462) beautifully exemplifies Korpela’s position as a postwar writer: “The shattering worldview, which other writers noted down from the outside, so to speak, is in Korpela depicted in structure and in style: the novel itself is a world that is shattered.”63

As many critics have suggested, Tohtori Finckelman seems to be divided into two in multiple ways: on one level it is a “realist” story, a Bildungsroman of a young man who is orphaned and inherits his parents’ farm. On another level, it is a “sur-realist” story about the alienation, dividedness and mental breakdown of the narrator-protagonist (see Sarajas 1963/1980, 61; Vainio 1975, 192–196). The seemingly realistic countryside milieu which Korpela creates in the first part of the novel is, in the second part, turned into a “shattering world” which evokes a feeling of a “ghostly mirror labyrinth” in which the different characters are reflecting and embodying the different sides of the protagonist, as Laitinen (1997, 461) describes. In a comprehensive study on Korpela’s works, Sari Salin (2002) has proposed that his novels are divided and doubled on linguistic, structural and thematic levels: “On a linguistic level, the doubling manifests as verbal irony, on a structural level as the dialogic form, and on a thematic level as the dividedness of a personality and as the doubling of characters (Doppelgangers).”64

The basic themes of Tohtori Finckelman—suffering, guilt, responsibility, and reconciliation—permeate all four of Korpela’s novels, and they also recall the trauma Korpela himself suffered in the war (see Vainio 1975, 129; 172; Laitinen 1997, 460; Salin 2002, 223). Yet, the war is never mentioned in Tohtori Finckelman or in Korpela’s first novel, Martinmaa mieshenkilö (Martinmaa, a Male Character, 1948), which was published soon after it ended. As Salin points out, the war is replaced by experiences of guilt and violence that attest to trauma. The novels are filled with different kinds of stories and motifs of violence:

---

63 “Särkynyt maailmankuva, jonka toiset kirjailijat ikäänkuin sivulta käsin teoksissaan merkitsevät muistiin, on Korpelalla ilmennetty rakenteen ja tyylin avulla: rokkaani itse on maailma, joka särkyy.” (Laitinen 1997, 462.)
64 “Keskeistä Korpelan romaneissa on kahdentuminen ja jakautuminen, joka näkyy roomain nien kielellisellä, rakenteellisellä ja temaattisella tasolla. Kielellisellä tasolla kahdentuminen on verbaalista ironiaa, rakenteellisella tasolla se on dialogisuutta ja temaattisella tasolla se on personallisuuden jakautumista ja henkilöhahmojen kahdentumista (kaksoisollennot).” (Salin 2002, 12.)
If one looks for the description of the postwar period in Korpela’s two first novels, one has to discover that there is none. The most important proof of the traumatic nature of the war is that it is not spoken about. The horrors of the war force their way out as feelings of guilt experienced by the protagonists, as grotesque characters and events and as an abundance of violent obsessions and embedded narratives.

When the war then becomes a central theme in Korpela’s last novels—Tunnustus (A Confession, 1961) and the posthumously published Kenttävartio (The Guard Camp, 1964)—the motifs of violence disappear (see Salin 2002, 224). In Tohtori Finckelman the character of an alcoholic former soldier, Lieutenant Salleva (who will be accused and convicted of rape in the story) is the only hint that the novel depicts a postwar period. At the same time, the effects of war can be read in the mental distress of the characters: in Tohtori Finckelman each character is shattered in turn. The feelings of guilt, estrangement, and disillusionment with the world which characterized the work of many postwar writers is depicted especially through a reference to failures in psychiatry: a science that was supposed to help people ends up creating inhuman methods of treatment and becomes a form of violence in itself. The novel depicts the alienation of a modern individual and disillusionment in the face of scientific advancements and cruel rationality that seem to be guiding humanity toward destruction.

Korpela’s subjective and psychological yet ironic, metafictional, and self-reflexive modernism has much in common with international postwar literature. Tohtori Finckelman is often linked to existentialist works like Albert Camus’s L’Étranger (1942) or Thomas Mann’s Doktor Faustus (1947) which reflected the questions of guilt and responsibility during and after the war (see Vainio 1975, 102–105; Salin 2002, 99–104). Another important context for Korpela’s works is the connection to Dostoyevsky which has often been noted in previous research (see Sarajas 1953/1980; Karhu 1977; Envall 1988; Salin 2002). In the first academic reading of Korpela’s novels, Annamari Sarajas proposes that Korpela’s protagonists are rewritings of Ivan and Alyosha of The Brothers Karamazov (1880): “At heart the themes of Dostoyevsky and Korpela...”

---

65 “Jos etsii sodan tai sodanjälkeisen ajan kuvausta Korpelan kahdesta ensimmäisestä romaanista, joutuu toteamaan, että sitä ei ole. Tärkein todiste sodan traumattisuudesta onkin, että siitä ei puhuta. Sodan kauhut kuitenkin tunkevat esiin päähenkilöiden syyllisyystunteinein, henkilöiden ja tapahtumien groteskiutena, moniselitteisinä väkivaltarikoksina sekä väkivaltaisen pakkomielteiden ja sisäkertomusten runsautena.” (Salin 2002, 14)

66 Salin (2002, 24) also reads Tohtori Finckelman as a postmodern, metafictional novel, drawing on Patricia Waugh’s notion of metafiction as a genre that emphasizes its own fictionality and explores the “possible fictionality of the world outside the literary fictional text” (see Waugh, 1984, 2). According to Salin: “What is essential in Korpela’s modernism is the radicalization of metafiction and intertextuality and the way they are intertwined with a radical problem of selfhood: the dividedness of the self.” (“Olennasta Korpelan modernismissa on metafiction ja intertekstuaalisuuden radikalisoituminen ja kietoutuminen radikaaliin minuuden probleematiikkaan, minuuden jakautumiseen.”) (Salin 2002, 24–25.)
are the same. Their works create a similar process of demarcation from the simple compassion of Alyosha to the deadly rationality of Ivan.”67 Other important intertexts for Tohtori Finckelman are the Faust legend (also used by Mann) about a scientist who sells his soul to the devil and Nietzschean ideas about the Übermensch and the denial of universal morality (see Salin 2002, 100; 126–129).

Even though Part One of Tohtori Finckelman appears as realist, the whole novel is free of connections to any actual time or place: the story happens in an unknown countryside village (Part One) and in an unknown city (Part Two). As Salin (2002, 15, 51–53) has noted, there is hardly any description of places or characters (unless description is used as a parody). In the first part of the novel, the first-person narrator recounts how he, as a sixteen-year-old boy, takes over his family’s farm. The second part focuses on the narrator-protagonist’s life as a psychiatrist working in a mental hospital in the city. The readers learn how the protagonist gradually becomes disillusioned with the world, other people, and his profession. As Kai Laitinen puts it, the protagonist “grows from an idealist into a dangerous Übermensch who is hungry for power and terrorizes the world around him, but he has to pay a high price for his power […].”68 The prologue and the epilogue (Part Three) of the novel make clear that the whole story is narrated from the position of recovering from a mental breakdown.

Like in Hämäläinen’s Kaunis sielu, in Tohtori Finckelman the narrator-protagonist is a “mad” character who invites empathy, compassion, and feelings of unsettlement and distance in readers. He is suffering from something, perhaps a psychiatric disorder, perhaps guilt for the crimes he may have committed, or more generally from the condition of a modern man or being an “abject hero.” However, different psychological and diagnostic interpretations are also disrupted by the complicated narrative structure and intertextual connections to other works. Moreover, the narrator is not only mentally distressed like the narrator of Kaunis sielu, but there is also reason to suspect that he is deceiving his readers on purpose: on a closer look, it turns out that he is also highly misogynous, commits immoral deeds, and might be a rapist. Like Kaunis sielu, the novel is built around a crime, which directs the readers toward ethical questions about the relationship between the self and the other. In Tohtori Finckelman this crime is a rape of a patient who is described as “retarded” and is said (by the narrator) to be in love with him. The narrator-protagonist is suspected of the rape—and many details point to his guilt—but he is ultimately cleared of the charges. In the end, another man is convicted, imprisoned in the psychiatric hospital led by the protagonist, and the crime remains unsolved. As Salin (2002, 220) has emphasized, the undecidability of the text poses a serious ethical challenge for the readers.

---

68 “[I]dealistista on kasvanut vaarallinen yli-ihminen, joka vallanhimoisen terrorisoi ympäräistään; mutta samalla hän joutuu maksamaan vallastaan kalliin hinnan […].” (Laitinen 1997, 460.)

The Taboo

Timo K. Mukka’s (1944–1973) distinctive, “arctic” oeuvre from the 1960s has often been contrasted with the formal experimentations of the literature of southern Finland at the time. His six novels, two collections of short stories, and one collection of poetry, portray life in small wilderness villages of northern Finland where the Charismatic Laestadian movement had a strong foothold. However, recent scholarship has started to see Mukka also as an avant-gardist writer and as a reformer of Lapland’s literature (see Arminen 2009; Lahtinen 2013). Like Hämäläinen and Korpela, Mukka was well read in literary history and in contemporary views about human psychology, subjectivity, and sexuality, and developed modernist themes and techniques in his own ways: bringing together his religious community background, the arctic milieu, and experimental forms of writing. As Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 17) writes, his early works create a connection to the naturalist tradition: the psychologies of the characters in his novels are not explained in any way, rather human beings are shown as biological creatures who behave and act according to the laws of nature. The intermingling of the characters and their material environments is also part of the “arctic” atmosphere created in Mukka’s novels. Further, in his first two works the narratives are embedded with what researchers have described as ballad features—songs and prayers—which form another metafictional, allegorical, and even mythical level to the seemingly realist or naturalist storytelling (see Paasilinna 1988; Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008; Lahtinen 2013). In his later works, Mukka created a collage technique through which he experimented with and contested the referential nature of literature to reality (see Arminen 2009).

Tabu (The Taboo) is Mukka’s second work, a novella published only a few months after his breakthrough with the novel Maa on syntinen laulu (The Earth Is a Sinful Song, 1964). In the original reception, Mukka’s first texts

---

69 Laestadianism is a Pietist revival movement that was founded by Lars Levi Laestadius (1800–1861) in Lapland in the nineteenth century. Both Mukka and Maria Vaara grew immersed in the Pietist culture and it is visible in their works.

70 Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 27) also compares Mukka interestingly to William Faulkner: “Whereas for Mukka, Lapland is a milieu where the inner passions and anxieties of the characters collide with social ideas and the forces of nature, for Faulkner the ‘deep south’ of the United States has a similar role.” (“Kun Mukalla Lappi toimii miljöönä, jossa henkilöiden siisäiset intohimot ja ahdistus törmäävät yhteisön käsityksiin ja luonnonvoimiin, toimii Faulknerilla vastaavassa asemassa Yhdysvaltojen ‘syyä etelä’.”) were often regarded as controversial, radical, and even pornographic because of their detailed descriptions of sex and sexuality. They were compared to modernist and postmodernist writers like D. H. Lawrence, Henry Miller, and Vladimir Nabokov, and in Finland to Hannu Salama’s Juhannustanssit (The Midsummer Dance, 1964). The books were read in a larger social and political context in which the morals of literature were under scrutiny: the portrayals of sex and religion in the novels published in 1964 and 1965 caused nation-wide debates and even led to a trial in which Hannu Salama was accused and convicted of blasphemy. Mukka avoided the trial apparently because he was a young, twenty-year-old author who had just published his first works, but at the same time he was less protected from attacks in the media than his more established colleagues (see Lahtinen 2013, 76–84).

71 The edition of Tabu included a short story “Sankarihymni” (A Heroic Anthem).

In popular opinion Mukka quickly gained a reputation as a writer of “sexual hysteria” and an epithet from one of his reviews, “the sexus of the wild north,” started to live a life of its own. Mukka’s early reception is described by Erno Paasilinna (1974/1988, 91) in the biography Timo K. Mukka—legenda jo eläessään (Timo K. Mukka—A Legend in His Own Lifetime, 1974) which was published soon after Mukka’s death and which also strongly influenced Mukka’s image as an author. As Arminen (2009, 437) remarks, Mukka’s works have been largely interpreted in the light of his personal life and the northern Finnish way of life. The detailed descriptions of sex and sexual experiences in Mukka’s works made them especially susceptible to accusations of “indecency” and “immorality,” but at the same time, both Maa on syntinen laulu and Tabu are highly ambiguous texts in which the “naturalist” descriptions and narration is interrupted by songs (in Maa on syntinen laulu), prayers (in Tabu) and mythical and symbolic elements.

Both stories are recounted from the perspective of a female narrator or focalizer and they offer potentially contradicting interpretations about gender and sexuality. The story of Tabu is constructed around three people: a thirteen-year old girl, Milka, and her widowed mother who live together in a small farm-house in northern Finland, and a man who arrives at the farm and starts to help them with haymaking and with the house. The man begins a sexual relationship with the preadolescent girl and with her mother (as the readers can infer), and we can observe how both fall in love with him. Two years later, the man realizes that Milka has become pregnant and he escapes from the village, abandoning the girl and her mother whose minds are shattered. The story is narrated by the adult Milka about two decades later.\(^\text{72}\) In addition to the description of the events twenty years earlier, the narration consists of prayers in which the adult \(^\text{72}\) The timeline of the novel suggests that the main events happen after the Finnish civil war of 1918, sometime in the early 1920s, and Mukka had planned that the time of narration would be during or after the Second World War (see Paasilinna 1988, 77).

---

Milka abandons her God—a kind of “inversed prayer,” as Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 189) describes. It is, however, unclear whether Milka addresses her speech to God or to the man who abandoned her. Like Tohtori Finckelman, Tabu presents its readers with an ethical challenge. We are left to decide whether Milka’s story should be read as it is told by the adult narrator—as a story about a failed love affair, loss, and shattering—or rather as a testimony of abuse and trauma, which it is on the level of the events.

In recent academic interpretations, Tabu has been read especially through the many symbols, mythical intertexts, and generic frames it uses, and this has resulted in readings that largely ignore questions of sexual abuse and trauma. For example, Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008) has discussed Tabu’s connections to Freud’s theory of the incest taboo and the effects its transgression has on the characters, family, and community. Toni Lahtinen (2013) focuses on symbols of femininity, female sexuality, and the myth of the virgin birth, and reads the novella as a story about the “sexual awakening” of a young girl. According to him, the “taboo” of the title is the “silenced, sexual and sacred story about the inexplicable pregnancy of a young girl.” The interpretations follow Mukka’s own thoughts about his work: in letters and interviews, Mukka describes Tabu as a rewriting of the “myth of the virgin birth” and as a “parody of the holy family.” According to him, the novella is a “lyrical epic work” which “shows the way a myth is born,” and his main aim seems to have been to deconstruct the myth of Christ’s birth from a virgin (see Paasilinna 1988, 74; 76; Lahtinen 2013, 64). Lahtinen also pays attention to how Mukka brings different mythical, biblical, folkloric, and ballad motifs to the northern Finnish milieu. As he points out, in the early reception Tabu was often compared to Nabokov’s Lolita (1955, Finn. transl. 1959), and following the reception and Mukka’s own descriptions, he reads Milka as a “nymphet,” as a liminal figure who inhabits a space between the worldly and the sacred. (Lahtinen 2013, 71; see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 195; 206.) Tabu and Lolita are thus connected through the theme and through the shared use of a mythical reference.

However, the connection to Lolita is important in another way which Lahtinen does not mention and Mäkelä-Marttinen only remarks on briefly. “The taboo” of the title is not the sexuality or the “sexual awakening” of a

---

73 “[V]aettu seksuaalinen ja pyhä kertomus nuoren selittämättömästä raskaudesta.” (Lahtinen 2013, 73; see also 63.)
74 Both descriptions are also the titles of Lahtinen’s and Mäkelä-Marttinen’s respective analyses. It is important to note that there is nothing humoristic in the “parody” Tabu enacts. In her study, Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008) reads Mukka’s works insightfully through psychoanalytical theories and Mikhail Bakhtin’s and Michael Bernstein’s studies on Menippean satire and “bitter carnival,” emphasizing the melancholic nature of Mukka’s “parodies.” She also pays attention to the traumatic elements in Mukka’s texts but does not discuss the question of abuse in Tabu further. (See especially Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 29; 187; 191.)
75 In a footnote, Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 195) mentions that both Tabu and Lolita are “ambivalent stories about incest.”
young girl, but rather the pedophilia and sexual abuse the novella hints at but never makes explicit. This has been noted by Outi Oja in her review of the republication of Tabu in 2004. As she points out, invitations to allegorical interpretation weaken the readers’ scope for reading the novella as a description of abuse. Moreover, since the story is narrated from Milka’s perspective, there is no omniscient narrator telling readers how to react to the events. (Oja 2004.) What makes the story difficult to grasp is that Milka herself guides her readers to read the text as a (failed) love story, and the novella is filled with symbolic and metaphorical elements and mythical intertexts that activate allegorical frames of reading. At the same time, the events themselves, as well as the perversiveness of the theme of mental distress and shattering in the novella, point toward trauma and abuse. In other words, the mythical and allegorical elements seem to conceal the sexual violence which is nonetheless clear in the story. Thus, even more than Tohtori Finckelman, Tabu puts its readers in a difficult position: to choose between conflicting paths of reading.

The Dirty Legends

A northern writer like Mukka, Maria Vaara (1931–1992) wrote her works outside the literary circles of southern Finland. Likaiset legendat (The Dirty Legends) is the first novel in an autofictional trilogy published in 1974, 1975, and 1976, followed by three more novels in 1978, 1980, and 1982. In addition to the autobiographical series, Vaara published three collections of poetry and two young adult novels. Her works draw from her personal experiences of mental illness and struggles for recovery. They have a clear focus on the creation of experiential worlds and narration of bodily experiences, affects, emotions, dreams, and hallucinations, which situates them as late examples of the Finnish modernist tradition, coming close to postmodernist explorations in autofiction.

However, in academic research and literary history, Vaara’s works have remained almost completely in the margins, except for Liisa Enwald (1989) who introduces Vaara in the history of Finnish women writers, Kari Sallamaa (2010) who writes about Vaara in the history of Northern Finnish literature, and Markku Eskelinen (2016) who includes Vaara in his recent history of Finnish prose fiction.76 Sallamaa notes that Likaiset legendat is “scattered and chaotic, without purposely being ‘postmodernist.’”77 Eskelinen, in turn, writes that the 76 There are also a few articles on Vaara: I have studied the writing of psychotic depression and the construction of an affective language in Likaiset legendat (Ovaska 2017a&b), and Kirsi Tuohela and Ritva Hapuli (2015, 172–176) have discussed its portrayal of the horror connected to mental shattering.

77 “[Likaiset legendat] on hajanainen ja kaootinen olematta silti tarkoituksellisesti ‘postmodernee.’” (Sallamaa 2010, 122.)
world portrayed in the novel “maintains both its epistemological allure and ontological unsettlement. It is a late modernist novel that is one of its kind: its focal aesthetic, ethical, poetic, and social qualities emerge from the depths of a serious and fatal illness.” He also emphasizes the literary value of Vaara’s works in addition to, and apart from, the psychological and experiential insights and knowledge they create.78

Among health care professionals and readers interested in questions of mental health, Vaara’s novels are still well-known, and their popularity and the discussions about them, for example on social media, suggests that they have a continuous influence on how Finnish readers understand experiences of mental illness.79 However, both the literary and the socio-cultural significance of Vaara’s works require more research. In Chapter 5, I focus on Vaara’s first novel and especially the way it constructs the psychotic world, but let us briefly look at it here in the context of the whole autofictional series and the socio-political and historical situation in which the novels were published.

Likaiset legendat was published in 1974, in the aftermath of the Finnish “November” movement to support people suffering from mental health problems.80 The publication included an afterword by one of the founders of the movement, psychiatrist and writer Claes Andersson, in which he praised Vaara’s ability to challenge the borders between “normal” and “abnormal” and to make the world of psychosis understandable for those who have not experienced it.

As Mary E. Wood (1994, 125) notes, in the early twentieth century it became customary that autobiographies of people suffering from mental illness were published with introductions by psychologists and psychiatrists: they “presented the texts as evidence of both their professional ability to cure the patient and the

---

78 “[…] Likaisten legendojen maailma säilyttää sekä epistemologisen kiehtovuutensa että ontoologisen ahdistavuutensa. Se on aivan omanlaisensa myöähismodernistinen romaani, jonka keskeiset esteettiset, eettiset, poeettiset ja sosiaaliset ominaisuudet nousevat vakavan ja hengenvaarallisen sairauden syyvyksistä.” (Eskelinen 2016, 492.)

79 This becomes visible in the marketing and reception of the recent autofictional novel Huomenkellotyytö (The Morning Bell Girl, 2013) which was written by Vaara’s daughter, Sarianna Vaara, and portrays a writer mother’s struggle with psychosis and addiction from a child’s and young woman’s perspective. The readers of Huomenkellotyytö referred also to Maria Vaara’s works and compared the ways the books represented and conveyed experiences of illness (see, e.g., blog “Anna minun lukea enemmän” 7.10.2013, online: annaminunlukeaenemmman.blogspot.com/2013/10/sarianna-vaara-huomenkellotyyto.html). Sarianna Vaara’s novel includes a scene in which the protagonist, now a young woman studying to become a nurse, hears a presentation about her mother’s works, and through reading the books, finally understands how severely ill her mother had been. Huomenkellotyytö is a fictionalized account of Sarianna Vaara’s childhood and youth, but it creates an explicit dialogue with Maria Vaara’s works through many connections and details, and just like them it underscores the meaning and understanding created through writing and reading.

80 “Marraskuun liike” (The November Movement, 1967–1972) was partly inspired by the international antipsychiatric movement. A very concrete aim was to help people suffering from psychiatric disabilities, the homeless, and prisoners, and the critique was directed especially against the problems in housing politics and mental health care.
wonders and terrors of mental illness as experienced from the inside.” Andersson’s (1974) epilogue to Vaara’s novel is a late example of this: he uses it to criticize psychiatry which for long has been “deaf” and “without language skills” to understand the shattered worlds of psychosis and emphasizes the individual and political responsibility toward the people who are suffering. Psychiatric like Andersson who challenged psychiatric practices from inside the discipline understood mental illnesses not only as biological or neurological disorders, but also as symptoms or manifestations of interpersonal traumas and socio-cultural problems. Experiences of mental illness were seen as meaningful responses to violent and oppressive social systems, norms, and intersubjective relations, and the social stigma around mental illness and inhumane forms of treatment were understood as part of the problem, much like in the international antipsychiatric movement (see, e.g, Laing 1960; Bateson 1972; Szasz 1974).

Likewise, Vaara’s novels raise intersubjective relations and socio-cultural structures to a key role in the way psychiatric disabilities are experienced. In terms of autobiography, Likaiset legendat portrays Vaara’s life after her first psychotic episode, at the age of 38 in 1969. The novel is divided into two parts: the first one depicts the protagonist Maria’s sessions with her therapist and the second one focuses on the psychotic experiences—“the dirty legends” of the title—and Maria’s time on a psychiatric ward. In her works, Vaara repeatedly criticizes psychiatric treatment for worsening the patient’s illness. This is emphasized especially in her second novel Kuuntele Johannes (Listen, Johannes, 1975) in which medicalization is portrayed as a source of illness and suffering: “I am an addict, I take too many drugs and you talk about new drugs. You are insane. I am ill because of the treatment and drugs.”

Likewise, Vaara’s novels raise intersubjective relations and socio-cultural structures to a key role in the way psychiatric disabilities are experienced. In terms of autobiography, Likaiset legendat portrays Vaara’s life after her first psychotic episode, at the age of 38 in 1969. The novel is divided into two parts: the first one depicts the protagonist Maria’s sessions with her therapist and the second one focuses on the psychotic experiences—“the dirty legends” of the title—and Maria’s time on a psychiatric ward. In her works, Vaara repeatedly criticizes psychiatric treatment for worsening the patient’s illness. This is emphasized especially in her second novel Kuuntele Johannes (Listen, Johannes, 1975) in which medicalization is portrayed as a source of illness and suffering: “I am an addict, I take too many drugs and you talk about new drugs. You are insane. I am ill because of the treatment and drugs.”

In Myrkkyseitikki (The Deadly Webcap, 1980), the chapter titles are names of different drugs and readers are shown the effects of the treatment of schizophrenia with the “first-generation” anti-psychotics (neuroleptics like Melleril) and hypnotic drugs (sleeping pills like Mandrax) which caused severe side effects and addiction. In Vaara’s last novel Tulilintu (The Fire Bird, 1982), the schizophrenia diagnosis which Vaara received after her first psychotic episode is challenged: “Now Jan-Christian claims: you are not schizophrenic. That

Likewise, Vaara’s novels raise intersubjective relations and socio-cultural structures to a key role in the way psychiatric disabilities are experienced. In terms of autobiography, Likaiset legendat portrays Vaara’s life after her first psychotic episode, at the age of 38 in 1969. The novel is divided into two parts: the first one depicts the protagonist Maria’s sessions with her therapist and the second one focuses on the psychotic experiences—“the dirty legends” of the title—and Maria’s time on a psychiatric ward. In her works, Vaara repeatedly criticizes psychiatric treatment for worsening the patient’s illness. This is emphasized especially in her second novel Kuuntele Johannes (Listen, Johannes, 1975) in which medicalization is portrayed as a source of illness and suffering: “I am an addict, I take too many drugs and you talk about new drugs. You are insane. I am ill because of the treatment and drugs.”

In Myrkkyseitikki (The Deadly Webcap, 1980), the chapter titles are names of different drugs and readers are shown the effects of the treatment of schizophrenia with the “first-generation” anti-psychotics (neuroleptics like Melleril) and hypnotic drugs (sleeping pills like Mandrax) which caused severe side effects and addiction. In Vaara’s last novel Tulilintu (The Fire Bird, 1982), the schizophrenia diagnosis which Vaara received after her first psychotic episode is challenged: “Now Jan-Christian claims: you are not schizophrenic. That 81 “Minä olen pilleristi, syön liikaa lääkekeitä ja sinä puhut uusista lääkkeistä. Sinä olet hullu. Minä sairastan hoitoa ja lääkekeitä, sinä tarjoat hoitoa ja lääkekeitä.” (Vaara 1975, 243.) Kuuntele Johannes also depicts the embodied meaning of the pills and the way their effect is felt as an affective (yet addictive) scaffolding: “Fingers knew only the letter M of the alphabet: Mandrax and Melleril.” (“Sormet aakkostivat vain M-kirjaimen. Mandraxia ja Melleriliä.”) (Vaara 1975, 146.); “Without the pills she could not make it. One had to be drunk enough to be mute, blind, and away from everyone.” (“Ilman pillereitä hän ei jaksaisi. Oli oltava sen verran humalassa, että voisi pysyä mykkäänä, sokkona ja kaikista kaukana.”) (Vaara 1975, 124.) Addiction to prescription drugs is a central theme also in Sarianna Vaara’s Huomenkellotytö.

I cannot know, but I do think: I am not a schizophrenic person and I have never been, although in the latest medical statements it says Schizophrenia latens. Borderline.”; “One has to put in some word as a diagnosis, Jan-Christian explains as if I knew nothing.”

The struggle with addiction and with the problem of diagnostics are central themes in all Vaara’s novels, however, it is important to note that the works are not directed against psychiatric treatment in itself, but rather against forms of treatment that augment the suffering of the patient. The novels also give credit to many things that were working in the mental health care system in the 1970s: Vaara was able to get therapy after she fell ill, she received social security, and the municipality offered support for child care when she was hospitalized. Most importantly, she always maintained the custody of her children as a single parent and she was able to create a career for herself as a writer for more than ten years. As Andersson (1974) emphasizes, Vaara had the ability to turn her experiences into an artistic form despite her illness, and—it should be added—despite the failures in the treatment.

In addition to the antipsychiatric movement, Vaara’s novels can be linked to the growing interest in autobiographical writing, documentaries, and confessional novels. In the 1970s, several well-known authors published books about their struggles with mental health, and Vaara’s works were among the first ones to portray experiences of severe mental illness and institutionalization in Finland. Before Vaara, there were only a few published autobiographies about life in mental institutions in Finland. The first mental asylum autobiography appears to be Aino Manner’s Viesti yöstä. Mielisairaalakokemuksia (A Message from the Night. Experiences from a Mental Hospital, 1935) in which Manner describes her life in different psychiatric institutions in Finland during the first decades of the century (see Tuohela 2008, 165; Tuohela 2015, 213–225; Tuohela & Hapuli 2015, 164–166). Internationally, Vaara’s novels align with the 82 “Nyt Jan-Christian sitten väittää minulle: Et sinä ole skitsofreeninen. Sitä en voi tietää, ajattelen kyllä: En ole skitsofreenikko enkä ole koskaan olutkaan, vaikka vimeisin lääkärinlausuntoihin on kirjoitettu Schizophrenia latens. Rajatila.” (Vaara 1982, 70.); “Papereihin on pantava joku sana diagnoosiksi, selittää Jan-Christian kuin en tietäisi mitään.” (Vaara 1982, 199.) Schizophrenia is also a diagnostic category that has often been seen the “a quintessential” form of “madness” in the modern era (Sass 1994, 13; Davidson 2013) and even as the emblem of the culture of the twentieth century (Deleuze & Guattari 1972; Jameson 1991). For problems of such sweeping claims in which “madness” is tied to “modernism” or “postmodernism”, see Wood 2013, 5.

---

84 Another early autobiography about experiences of mental illness was Maria Åkerblom’s (1898–1981) book (written in Swedish) Maria Åkerblom’s autobiografi och första delen af rise of feminist representations of mental illness and life inside psychiatric institutions after the Second World War: fictional or fictionalized accounts like Janet Frame’s Faces in the Water (1961) and Sylvia Plath’s The Bell Jar (1963), and autobiographical works like pseudonym Renee’s Autobiography of a Schizophrenic Girl: The True Story of Renee (1947, edited by Margarite Sechehaye) and Hannah Green’s (Joanne Greenberg’s) I Never Promised You a Rose Garden (1964). In these works, including Vaara’s, illness is seen from “the inside” and it is linked to oppressive social norms and structures of gender inequality: the texts are narrated from a female perspective and they reveal problems of mental health care, focusing on the experiences of patients, particularly women, inside psychiatric institutions.

In Vaara’s works, different cultural narratives are closely connected with the experiences of distress and suffering. In Likaiset legendat, the hallucinations the narrator experiences are filled with religious images and stories, revealing the role of socio-cultural norms and narratives in the formation of psychotic experiences: the way the content and meanings of hallucinatory experiences are deeply bound by culture and entangled in one’s life history. The title of the novel, “The Dirty Legends,” refers to the “visions” the narrator experiences, creating an allusion to medieval mystics like Margery Kempe (1373–c. 1438) and Joan of Arc (1412–1431). However, unlike in R. D. Laing’s praise of hallucinations and visions (for example in The Politics of Experience, 1967) or other romanticized portrayals of madness of the same era, in Likaiset legendat psychotic hallucinations are not viewed as sources of liberating insight (although they do have also therapeutic value), but rather as results of illness, trauma and haunting cultural narratives that are connected to oppressive social norms and structures. Like Kaunis sielu, Tohtori Finckelman and Tabu, Likaiset legendat...
Fictions of Madness

focuses on subjective truths and on the distressing and unsettling worlds of mental illness and shattering, but at the same time it creates understanding about how subjects and their experiences are shaped by their social, cultural, and material circumstances and how psychiatric disability is often connected to different forms of trauma, abuse, and violence.
1. Should I murder him? He walks on the street, people are moving around him, there is perhaps some mist in the air, he walks around, he thinks about people, about the shop window, the rain. He thinks about all of this. I must murder him. Do you understand? [...] He must not see, hear, or think, he must be thrown into darkness, into infuriating, horrible darkness.

Thus the narrator of Kaunis sielu begins her story with a set of troubling questions which she addresses to herself and her readers. She reveals her violent thoughts and lays out the grounds for her story. The beginning also positions the readers as receivers of her confession. But can we understand that the man must be thrown into “infuriating, horrible darkness”? The narrator’s murderous thoughts transgress all common social and moral norms, and she herself knows it. The way she obsesses about the man’s existence in the world, about the simple facts that he “walks,” “thinks,” “hears,” and “sees,” appears strange: it is excessive, there is too much emotion. The narrator tries to imagine what the world feels like for the man (the people, the shop window, the rain) and comes to the disturbing conclusion that he cannot have experiences at all. The narrator’s obsession with the man is combined with an extreme solipsism: the man cannot exist in the same world with her.

If this were a real person, we would be worried. Yet we know that the narrator is a fictional character, and by laying out her thoughts and asking for her readers’ opinion, she invites us inside her experiential world. She summons us, if not as her accomplices, at least to participate in the quest of finding out what is happening to her.

In Kaunis sielu, Hämäläinen focuses on the myriad of thoughts, sensations, and emotions that arise in a person’s mind, as Woolf (1984, 160) wrote, “from the beginning of consciousness to the end,” and explores how fleeting experiences can be turned into a narrative form. The novel is written in a diary-like technique which resembles automatic writing: in her 106 fragments, the narrator-protagonist both records and reflects on her experiences as they unfold. The text could be described as an affect diary in which the narrator tries to register and make sense of her changing and/or obsessive feelings and thoughts: it is passionate, repetitive, and constantly contradictory. At the same time, the narration has a clear communicative intent and the narrator often addresses a hypothetical audience. She recounts what has just happened or what she experiences at the moment of narration and asks her readers to try to understand her. The narrative situation is, however, ambiguous: on the one hand, the narrator comments on her process of writing; on the other, she deviates from the diary form, coming close to a spoken (or even autonomous) monologue. The text is controlled by the narrator's shifting experiences, and the narration of any “outside” events becomes secondary to the description of what is going on in the narrator's mind.

Kaunis sielu can thus be seen almost as an exaggerated example of the cognitive narratologists' conviction that “narrative fiction is, in essence, the presentation of fictional mental functioning” (Palmer 2004, 5; also Zunshine 2006). In fact, one could argue that the narrative in Kaunis sielu is nothing but movements of the narrator-protagonist’s mind. However, this does not mean that the text’s focus is solely on the “interiority” of the narrator’s mind, not even when it centers on experiences (dreams, fantasies, and hallucinations) that have no immediate connection to the surrounding world. Rather, Hämäläinen constructs her narrator’s consciousness and experiences as deeply entangled with the world, guided by the possibilities it affords and restrictions it imposes, 87 The narrator creates what Herman (2002, 343) has called “double deixis”: the “you” refers both to the readers outside the storyworld and to the narrator’s hypothetical narratees inside the storyworld.

---

88 As Cohn (1978, 15) describes them, “autonomous monologues” are “unmediated, and apparently self-generated”: they give the impression that they are not spoken or written but rather consist of “silent self-communion” of a character. On a similar narrative situation in Sartre’s La Nausée (1938), see Cohn 1978, 213–216. However, whereas Sartre’s novel at first clearly mimics a diary with the dates written before the entries, the fragments in Hämäläinen’s novel are not dated, only numbered. What connects Kaunis sielu to the diary form is that the narrator makes references to the moment of writing, the narration has a communicational and reflective aim (but the narrator’s audience does not seem to be present in the same space with her), and the narration is not retrospective like in a memoir, but rather the events progress in turns with the narration: the narrator occasionally narrates events retrospectively, and occasionally reports what is happening or what she is experiencing at the moment of narration. In other words, Kaunis sielu seems to be based on an autobiographical narrative form but “slides” into the “terrain of the autonomous monologue,” as Cohn (ibid., 213) would put it. This is not surprising, since Hämäläinen was influenced by Dostoyevsky’s Notes from the Underground, in which the narrative situation is likewise ambiguous (it is uncertain whether the narrator is writing or speaking his story) and which anticipated many modernist innovations (see also Cohn 1978, 176).
moved and shaped by the social world and other people: as fundamentally affective, embodied, and embedded in the world. This makes Kaunis sielu also a political text: a study of the way experiences are shaped by cultural and social norms and narratives.\(^89\)

This chapter focuses on the “mind in the world” that is created in Kaunis sielu. It charts the techniques through which the novel invites its readers to feel and make sense of the experiences of the narrator, but also to pay attention to the aesthetic, artificial, and fictional qualities and meanings of the mind evoked in the text (for example, the paradoxical “beautiful soul” of the novel’s title). As discussed in Chapter 1, fictional minds are constructed in readers’ minds in a tension between a sense of lifelikeness and an understanding of their fictionality. The narrative discourse in Kaunis sielu mimics the constantly shifting modes of intentionality (perceiving, remembering, imagining, dreaming, hallucinating) and alterations in bodily experiences and affectivity, as well as the fragmentariness of real-life consciousness, creating a sense of lifelikeness. At the same time, however, it also underscores the aesthetic, artificial, and fictional quality of the narrator’s mind. From a literary historical perspective, I argue that Hämäläinen develops new techniques of consciousness presentation in order to create an evocative—affective, aesthetic, and politically transgressive—portrayal of the mind and the way it interacts with the world. The text is experimental, modernist, and subversive, but in many ways contradictory and difficult to approach because of its repetitive patterns and inconsistencies.\(^90\)

If the story of Kaunis sielu consists of (and is controlled by) the narrator-protagonist’s shifting experiences, what actually “happens” in it? When reading the novel, it is impossible to be sure whether the events the narrator recounts really occur in the storyworld or whether she imagines, dreams, or hallucinates them. Nonetheless, readers are invited into a storyworld: we can get a sense of a physical space and time (Helsinki in the late 1920s) and follow the narrator’s movements in the city. She reflects on her adulterous relationship with her lover and makes plans to murder him. We are shown how the obsession with the man is manifested in feelings of disgust, hate, and shame and how she goes through fantasies, dreams, and hallucinations: she has experiences of alienation from the world and other people, imagines “filthy” and “artistic” small devils as her companions, and a sexual desire for women disturbs her thoughts.

---

\(^89\) Stang (2015, 227; 232) has also paid attention to the way Hämäläinen constantly treats political and feminist topics in her works (female sexuality, motherhood, abortion, homosexuality) but denies in her interviews and memoir that she had any “political” views as a young writer.

\(^90\) Part of the difficulty of reading Kaunis sielu comes from the fact that Hämäläinen herself never properly edited the manuscript. Yet, many of the inconsistencies, contradictions, and repetitions of the text have aesthetic and political functions, as we will see. As discussed in 1.4, Kaunis sielu is complex because it brings together influences and motifs from so many different literary periods and movements: romanticism, realist and naturalist literature, Dostoyevsky, decadent literature, early twentieth-century psychology, 1920s themes of modernity, and discussions about the “New Woman.”

The narrator’s motivation for telling her story is to “make sense” of herself, especially to find out the reasons for her feelings and actions: the extreme hate and disgust at the man, the desire for women, and the shame and guilt she feels. Before the murder, she wonders constantly about her state of mind: “Am I going insane?”; “I am perhaps going insane. I must figure this out.”; “Isn’t this madness?” And after the murder, she starts looking for reasons for it: “Why did I kill him? I do not have any reason that would seem serious, solemn”; “I must find out why I committed the murder”; “This I feel now: I have to find out why I committed the murder, it is the only thing that matters.” As discussed earlier, “madness” is a label that is often used to categorize experiences that cannot be explained: that are puzzling, disturbing, or unsettling (see also Abbott 2018, 18). This is what the narrator of Kaunis sielu does: she constantly labels her experiences as “insane” when she feels that she cannot understand herself. At the same time, she invites her readers to assess this “diagnosis.” Do we agree that she is going insane? How should the experiences depicted in the text be approached and conceived of?

Toward the end of the novel, it becomes more and more clear that the narrator’s attempts to “make sense” of herself are failing. She starts to discuss her selfhood as a mosaic work that is broken into pieces, connecting it to her inability to arrange events and thoughts, as well as to an uncertainty about who she is. She complains that she is disgusted by her efforts of trying to arrange her thoughts and find reasons for her actions: “Let everything be a mosaic, patterns, futile squares and circles”; “I am only mosaic. Blue, gray, yellow squares. A pile of bricks. A lousy pile of bricks.” In the last fragment, the mosaic seems to be the final explanation and the only acceptable metaphor for her selfhood, and it is left for the readers to put everything together: “I am a condemnable maniac; I shall leave you my bricks, my mosaic. Create me; arrange my bluish gray and yellow bricks. Which one of you can understand yourselves?” It is the task of the readers to create and arrange the identity of the narrator by following the movements of her mind and reconstructing her story. The self is shattered and

---

91 “Tulenko hulluksi?” (KS 8; 9); “Minä olen kenties tulossa hulluksi. Minun on tämä asia selvitetävä.” (KS 10); “Eikö tämä ole hullautta?” (KS 77.)
92 “Miksi minä hänest murhasin? Mitään syytä ei minulla ole joka tuntuisi vakavalta, juhlasseltta.” (KS 101); “Minun on päästävä selvyyteen miksi murhasin...” (KS 109.) “Sen minä nyt tunnen, että minun on päästävä selvyyteen miksi murhan tein, se on ainoa millä on merkitystä.” (KS 109.)
94 “Minä olen tuomittava hullu; jätän teille palikkani, mosaiikkini. Luokaa minut, järjestelkää, siniharmaat ja keltaiset palikkani. Kuka teistä ymmärtää itsensäkään?” (KS 142.)
uncertain, and the fragmentariness of the story becomes a metaphor for it, just like the mosaic. However, from the beginning to the end, the narrator maintains her narrative agency, even though the efforts to create a coherent story and a unified identity fail.95 The novel also asks us to reflect on our own experiences and identities: to what extent is it even possible to “arrange” oneself?

Before I continue to the more detailed analysis, a cautious word about the transgressive powers of representations of “madness” is in order. Even if the portrayals of distress and shattering were used as a source for creating understanding about the mind as relational and embedded in the world and understanding about subjectivity, gender and sexuality, and the ways social norms shape us, the label of “madness” is still tied to different forms of stigmatization and oppression and it is a problematic metaphor for transgression (see also Caminero-Santangelo 1998). As Foucault (1993, xii) famously writes, madness implies silence, inability to speak and to express oneself. In this context, Kaunis sielu offers a cultural representation of a subject who is given a voice and who is able to speak out her experiences. Unlike her literary predecessors, for example Bertha Mason locked in the attic in Charlotte Brontë’s Jane Eyre (1847), the narrator of Charlotte Perkins Gilman’s The Yellow Wall-Paper (1892), Edna Pontellier in Kate Chopin’s The Awakening (1899) or, in Finnish literature, the female protagonists of Minna Canth’s novels, Alma Karell in Salakari (1887) and Sylvi in Sylvi (1893), the protagonist of Kaunis sielu is not bound by her social position or physical constraints. She is not married, imprisoned in her own home, “in the attic” or in hospital—she even avoids prison after the murder. She is remarkably free, a “New Woman” of the 1920s, exploring the streets of Helsinki as a flâneuse, moving freely from one place to another, both physically and in her writing and imagination.96 Hämäläinen even provides her with what Woolf demanded for female writers the year Kaunis sielu was finished: money and a room of her own. As the narrator states: “I am not completely without assets.”97

Yet, she does resemble the rebellious and victimized female characters of the times before (and after) her in that her story ends in death. The novel’s conventional, closed ending connects it to the realist and naturalist representations of madness as failed rebellion.98 Kaunis sielu also risks romanticizing mental

---

95 As narrative theorist Matti Hyvärinen (2008; 2012) has emphasized, the idea of narrative as “coherence” or “unity” is a rather normative one. He criticizes especially Galen Strawson’s influential claim “against narrativity” (2004) for misrepresenting the notion of narrative identity (e.g., Bruner 1987) as something that does not allow fragmentariness and breaks.

96 On the emergence of the “New Woman” and femme fatale in Finnish literature in the beginning of the twentieth century, see, e.g., Hapuli, Lappalainen, Koivunen & Rojola 1992; Hapuli 1992; Rojola 1992; Melkas 2006; Parente-Čapková 2014.

98 As Elaine Showalter (1985, 211) writes, women are punished for their sexuality: in the nineteenth century for expressing sexuality in general; in the twentieth century for transgressing illness and suffering, a worry shared by many feminist scholars who have analyzed literary representations of female madness and illness. In Kaunis sielu, the restrictions are not material, but they are incorporated and enacted as feelings of shame, disgust and self-hate, as the following analysis will show. The novel thus maintains a tension in which the narrator labels her experiences as “mad” and connects her “madness” to being “unnatural” and “criminal” and she dies in the end, but at the same time, her affective, experimental discourse creates a space for social and aesthetic revolt. This revolt is precarious and not without its problems, but it is a revolt nonetheless.

In the following, I first move chronologically through the text and look at the narrator’s interaction with the world from two perspectives which are tightly connected: the construction of the narrator’s “inner” experiential world and the way she perceives the “outside” world. More precisely, in the first section, I focus on the narrator’s experiential world and show how Hämäläinen creates a narrative technique in which the narrator, on the one hand, reflects on her experiences and tries to organize them into a coherent, linear narrative, yet narrates events simultaneously as they happen, constructing a fragmentary, associative stream of consciousness. In the second section, the emphasis is more on the “external” world and the way the narrator navigates her environment: I look at the murder scene she depicts and the way her perspective colors the world around her, leading to an uncertainty as to what part of the story happens in the storyworld and what is imagined or hallucinated by the narrator. In the second section, I also elaborate on the narrator’s imaginings and the portrayal of hallucinations as a means of trying to get a sense of control and agency over the world. In the third section, I turn to the thematic questions of the novel: the conscious and unconscious patterns the narrator’s mind makes, the way her experiences are shaped by social norms and narratives, and how especially norms governing sexuality result in feelings of shame, disgust, and self-hate. The chapter ends with a discussion about the transgressions enacted in the novel, and their aesthetic and political meanings.

heterosexual norms. Sara Ahmed (2010) notes that the habit of “killing off” especially lesbian characters in popular fiction lasted late into the twentieth century.

100 In her seminal essay Illness as Metaphor, Susan Sontag warns of these kinds of metaphorical associations in which illness (she writes particularly about tuberculosis and cancer) is connected to psychological traits or ideas (e.g., madness associated to criminal nature): “My point is that illness is not a metaphor, and that the most truthful way of regarding illness—and the healthiest way of being ill—is one most purified of, most resistant to, metaphoric thinking.” (Sontag 1978, 3.)
2.1. The Construction of the Experiential World

The special lifelikeness of narrative fiction—as compared to dramatic and cinematic fictions—depends on what writers and readers know least in life: how another mind thinks, another body feels. In depicting the inner life, the novelist is truly a fabricator. (Cohn 1978, 5–6.)

The world that first becomes available for the readers of Kaunis sielu is the experiential world of the narrator: the world consisting of her changing thoughts, perceptions, feelings, and sensations, as well as her memories, imaginings, dreams, and hallucinations. Hämäläinen is a “true fabricator” in Cohn’s sense, offering us an impression of the “inner life” of the narrator-protagonist as it unfolds in her experience. We are often in the moment in which the narrator is recounting her experiences, and through the simultaneity of telling and action, Hämäläinen tries to cancel the distance between the narrating I and the experiencing I: to make readers feel that we have almost direct access to the narrator’s experiences. Hämäläinen also repeatedly takes the presentation of consciousness to extremes: on the one hand, because she depicts extreme experiences of distress and shattering, on the other, because she makes her narrator fervently move between different modes of intentionality and different affective states. The result is that readers are forced to keep track of the movements of the narrator’s mind to be able to follow the “story.” Let us look more closely at how the narrator’s experiential world is constructed, how it is framed as “abnormal” or “mad,” and how the readers are invited to move together with the narrator and to try to interpret her experiences.

A Mind in Constant Movement

As we saw, the novel begins with the narrator’s ponderings about whether she should kill her lover. In the second fragment, the narrator’s thoughts move away from the man for a moment and she starts to reflect on her current situation and how she feels that she has changed:

2. Not long ago I was, although not very happy, an ordinary, calm human being. I studied; I had acquaintances. Now I cannot talk with anybody. I am prevented by a startle, by nervous, small thoughts that come with it. I would like to take a hold of the chin of a serious, stiff, fattish woman and raise it lightly and, as it were, fix her expression that disgusts me.

I sternly hate the evil expression on the woman’s face, the discontent. Perhaps she is only nervous, but she looks mean, I think. I know very well that my touch would not alter her expression, it would not make it graceful, benevolent, gentle. On the contrary, she would become red with anger, she would start to speak in a furious, unnaturally loud voice, talk quickly, moving her head, her eyes sparkling spitefully.
The narrator begins by offering a list of her various “symptoms.” Not long ago she was an “ordinary, calm human being” who “studied and had acquaintances,” but now she cannot talk with anybody: she startles for no apparent reason and has “nervous, small thoughts.” Then suddenly the self-reflective stance disappears, and the narrator brings about an image of a “stiff fattish woman” whose face she says she would like to touch and “fix” her “evil expression” which “disgusts” her. We get the impression that she is observing the woman, as if sketching her on paper. They are perhaps in the same room, but we cannot know for sure. Then she starts to imagine how the woman would act if she actually touched her. The description grows into a horrifying scene in which the woman is speaking in “a furious, unnaturally loud voice” and “moving her head, her eyes sparkling spitefully.”

The nightmarish fat woman appears to the text as if from nowhere: the complete lack of framing creates an impression that the narrator is registering her surroundings in a camera-like fashion, recording what she sees but adding things from her imagination. We are invited to follow how the woman’s face turns from something perceived into something imagined. At the same time, the description reveals the narrator’s deeply affective relationship with the world around her: it disturbs her and triggers both affective responses and images in her mind. Hämäläinen seems to be exploring the way a “nervous,” shattering mind works: she traces the way the body reacts to the surrounding world, the way mental images sometimes just “appear” without any conscious effort—even take control of one’s experiences—and the way perception and imagination are intermingled. Similar moments recur throughout the novel: the narrator often describes a scene only to soon reveal that she has imagined or hallucinated it. All this creates a sense of uncertainty about the storyworld and invites readers to constantly change their interpretations of what is happening.

As the passage continues, the narrator resumes a more reflective stance and states explicitly that she has difficulties in controlling her body, gestures and acts:
Chapter 2: A Mind in a World

2. [...] I live in constant fear of biting somebody’s finger, hitting their face, kissing them passionately, or, in the middle of a silence, shouting loudly some word, some private, meaningless word.

2. [...] Minä elän alituisessa kauhussa, etten vain purisi ketään sormeen, läimähyttäisi naamalle, suutelisi kiihkeästi tai kesken hiljaisuutta huutaisi kovalla äänellä jotain sanaa, yksityistä, merkitöntä sanaa. (KS 6.)

She seems to fear that her experiences as if “leaked” into the world around her: that she would lose the conscious control of her body and bite, hit, or kiss someone, shout something unintelligible. She struggles to prevent herself from acting in a way that would break social norms and saying something “private” or “meaningless” that does not conform to the shared language. An understanding of the narrator’s alienation from the consensus world, a lack of control over her thoughts and actions, and an uncertainty about the accuracy of her perceptions is emerging.

The first two fragments create an overall sense that readers are “captives” inside the narrator’s perspective: we are forced to follow her random, obsessive, and violent thoughts, perceptions, imaginings, and memories as they appear one after another and to keep track of them. The narrator’s lack of self-knowledge and conscious control of her experiences is mirrored in the readers’ lack of knowledge about the storyworld. Häämäläinen creates a narrative form in which everything comes as a “surprise” both to the narrator and to the readers, asking us to reflect what it feels like to lose control of one’s thoughts and actions. After thus revealing her current state of mind, and after some more reflections about murdering the man, the narrator moves on to discuss what could be interpreted as a possible cause for the experiences that disturb her: her “story” begins to form.

However, even when the narrator is trying to create a narrative of how she changed from an “ordinary human being” to the nervous person she is now, she feels constantly disturbed by the world around her and ends up rather recording her shifting experiences than creating a linear narrative of what has happened. As she is doing this, she oscillates between an associative “stream of consciousness” and reflection of her experiences, creating a sense of immediacy and distance in turns. A tension between her experiences of distress and efforts to reflect on and narrate their causes becomes even clearer.

A Struggle to Narrate: Immediacy and Distance

Let us look at a passage (briefly discussed in Chapter 1) in which the narrator tries to recount a memory of her first meeting with her lover. She records, in the present tense, what is going on in her body, thoughts, and in the world around her at the moment of narration. She tells her readers how her head aches and everything disturbs her. The report grows into a frantic monologue of how she is perhaps “going insane”:

6. My head aches. The lamp disturbs me. Everything disturbs me, even my own clothes; there should not be any light, no chair, no table. Should I break the lamp, bite my hands? My God, My God, am I going insane? Everything is muddled; I cannot arrange events in my mind. A table leg appears in my thoughts, it was varnished, shorter than the others, he sat there, at that table, when we first met. Now the table leg is the only clear image in my mind. [...] I must first explain, explain carefully the table leg before I can begin. That table leg hovers around me, in my eyes, in the empty space. I bite my hands and repeat to myself: it must be explained, I can see it clearly. Varnished and some string, shorter.

The narrator turns from the disturbing perception of the lamp, her clothes, chair, and table to a memory of a table leg which brings her to her first encounter with the lover. She complains that “everything is muddled” and she is unable to “arrange events”—unable to create a coherent narrative: the table leg needs to be explained first to continue the story. The leg seems to be able to give her some kind of an answer, offer a point of fixation, but the answer is fleeting. The image of the leg hovers in her mind, but its meaning stays unverbalized. Finally, the syntax breaks—“Varnished and some string, shorter”—and the whole effort to explain, even to verbalize her experience, seems to lose ground, at least for a moment.

As discussed in Chapter 1, the narrator’s “external” reality becomes fused with her “internal” world. The details of the material, sensory world seem to have “taken hold” of the narrator’s experiences, and there is both a sense of lifelikeness and an artistic quality: the image of the table leg hangs in the air like a picture that is filled with affective meaning. Perception, imagination, and memory are tightly intertwined, triggering new thoughts and experiences. The table leg scene, as many other passages in Kaunis sielu, creates an impression of a “stream of consciousness,” a notion which was adapted to literary studies from William James (1892/1955) to depict modernist techniques of constructing the effect of an experiencing mind. The passage strives not only to present thoughts but also the random flow of thought, its “illogical,” ungrammatical and associative dimensions. (See, e.g., Cohn 1978, 84; Prince 2003, 94; Herman 2011b, 247.) The sequencing of events follows the order of the narrator’s impressions and memories as they “arrive” to her rather than any chronological order of past events, and the narrator’s questions and exclamations emphasize the impression of immediacy. The passage is associative and, in the end, ungrammatical.

---

101 On pages 114–117 of the novel, we find a relatively unified and logical description of the narrator’s relationship with her lover and of the reasons why she committed the murder, although this is soon contested. In fact, the narrator offers several different interpretations of the events and her experiences, and thus creates several contradicting narratives. I discuss the stories the narrator constructs more carefully in 2.2 and 2.3.

Yet, it is still far from prototypical and most famous examples of stream of consciousness which create the impression of a completely unmediated thought process, like Molly’s associative, ungrammatical passages of autonomous monologue at the end of James Joyce’s Ulysses (1922). There are at least four important differences. Unlike Joyce’s Molly, the narrator of Kaunis sielu stops to reflect on her experiences for moments (“I cannot arrange events in my mind”), and the distance between the narrating I and the experiencing I grows, thus cancelling the most associative and instant impression. Even though the narrator often records her experiences as they happen, the narration occasionally gives the impression of a written account. Moreover, as we have seen, Hämäläinen’s narrator addresses her thoughts to someone else (to an unnamed audience): there is an effort to narrate and to communicate, whereas Molly has no audience or communicative intent apart from herself. Finally, the narrator’s habit of recording her own bodily movements adds a theatrical quality to the text: “I bite my hands and repeat to myself: it must be explained, I can see it clearly.” As Cohn observes in relation to autonomous monologues, passages like this in which first-person narrators verbalize their bodily movements as they occur tend to give an impression of narrators being like “gymnastics teachers vocally demonstrating an exercise” (Cohn 1978, 222).

---

102 As Cohn (1978, 78) notes, James understood “stream of consciousness” not as purely verbal, but also as consisting of visual images. Also Hämäläinen’s text creates an impression that the “stream of consciousness” is composed of associative thought patterns, fragments of inner speech, and mental images.

103 A famous passage from the very end of Molly’s monologue goes as follows: “queer little streets and the pink and blue and yellow houses and the rosegardens and the jessamine and cactuses and Gibraltar as a girl where I was a Flower of the mountain yes when I put the rose in my hair like the Andalusian girls used or shall I wear a red yes and how he kissed me under the Moorish wall and I thought well as well him as another and then I asked him with my eyes to ask again yes and then he asked me would I yes to say yes my mountain flower and first I put my arms around him yes and drew him down to me so he could feel my breasts all perfume yes and his heart was going like mad and yes I said yes I will Yes.” (Joyce 2000/1922, 932–933.)

104 See Cohn (1978, 217–222) for a detailed analysis of Molly’s autonomous monologue.
There is thus both a sense of lifelikeness created by the affectivity of the narrator’s words and a sense of artificiality and constructedness evoked by the slightly illogical and dramatized (what unnatural narratologists would call “unnatural” or “anti-mimetic”) way of narrating. However, readers of the passage can easily disregard these reminders of the artificiality of the affects and sensations constructed in the text and maintain the illusion of “direct” access to the narrator’s mental processes. Hämäläinen’s narration also reminds us that, in addition to the efforts of capturing the “ungrammatical” and associative dimensions of thought, narrative techniques that create the effect of stream of consciousness often show the mind in action with the world, receiving impressions, reacting to them. Even when constructing memories and imaginings, the passage shows the relationality of the mind: the way the experiences are brought forth in a constant interaction with the world, objects, and other people.

Right after talking about the table leg, the narrator makes a new effort at reconstructing her first memories of the man. She tells the reader that she “fights herself away” from immediate sensations and impressions: the distance between the narrating I and the experiencing I grows again for a moment but immediately closes as the narrator offers a fragmentary account of the past events, again coming close to stream of consciousness (starting from the word “adultery”):

6. […] I have fought myself away from the table leg. We met. Adultery. Clammy, naked limbs in bluish darkness. Weirdly fresh skin like in an oil painting. Naked limbs in carefree and wild embraces. At first, I did not come to think that he has a home, a wife with a checked skirt, a child.

After the short reflective sentence and move to the past (“We met”), the narrator evokes the past as if it were present through a verbless sentence. Even though the passage can be interpreted as an effort to recount past events, the narrator still does not create a coherent narrative, but rather offers a list of events and a collection of images. She is as if looking at herself from the outside, without emotion: “clammy limbs in bluish darkness,” “weirdly fresh skin like in an oil painting,” “naked limbs in carefree and wild embraces.” The narration resembles a description of a painting (as the narrator herself hints when she mentions the oil painting) or a montage: it is as if different images were flashing before the readers’ eyes. There are no verbs, only a list of nouns which creates and

---

105 There are several other passages in which the narrator’s description of the world comes close to the description of a painting or a montage. Later in the novel she talks about her impression of simultaneity and immediacy (see also Cohn 1978, 234). The notion of adultery is evoked first with one word and in the end through the “disnarrated” (see Prince 2003, 22): the narrator “did not” “at first” think about the man’s family. The negation (not thinking, yet actually thinking) also works to direct the readers’ attention toward the narrator’s conflicted experiences and unconscious processes: although the narrator repeatedly insists that the adultery meant nothing to her, she constantly returns to the fact that the man was married.

A page later, she continues the description of the man and his family, and finally concludes that her own perception of the world has been (and is) different from the consensus world. There is a gap between the world “as it is” and the way she perceives it to be:

6. […] He was sitting in their company, there were scraps of a meal on the table or some sewing, the room had wallpaper with dark, yellow flowers: sad, melancholy in a horrible, trivial way. No, I did not think at first—and after all, it was true, horribly true, the wallpaper, the wife, the child with her tiny bed, everything was real, but so distant to me, as if it did not exist. But only at first.

   Slowly I started to see the reality, everything became clear. Even now I can, in a way, see everything behind his head: the smell of the soil in the rustling grass, the woodshed, the mugwort swaying in the fog.

Again, the description comes close to a still-life image: the narrator remembers (or imagines) the room, a table, scraps of a meal or some sewing on it, the “sad, melancholy” wallpaper, the wife, the child in its bed. She complains that none of it felt real to her—as if the man’s home and family were only figures in a painting (or actors on stage, as she suggests a few fragments later, KS 13). Then, however, she says that she started to “see the reality,” “everything became

“new” perception of the world: “I believe that as I am forced to live amongst people these last months of my life, as I am forced to really see the quietly shining and moving buds of the spring and the bluish snow, […] I will gradually understand the value of life—especially once I know that each moment it slips from my hands—and I shall love it and feel remorse for what I have done. This is what I think.” (“Uskon, että joutuessani elämään ihmisten keskuudessa elämän viimeiset kuukaudet, näkemään todellakin hiljaa kiiltävät ja liikkuvat silmut keväällä ja sinervän lumen […] olen ymmärtävä elämän arvon vähitellen – varsinkin kun tiedän sen joka hetki hupeen käsistäni – ja olen sitä rakastava ja tunteva katumusta teostani. Näin ajatte- len.”) (KS 79–80, emphasis added.) clear.” She apparently understood that the family was real and that they too existed in the same world as her and had experiences of their own. Finally, she states, more cryptically, that even now she “in a way” sees everything “behind the man’s head” and offers a short scene which can be understood as a description of a place where they have been meeting.

In the passage, perception, memory, and imagination are again intertwined, but the narrator also seems to slip out of her alienated, solipsistic state for a moment and understand that there is a shared social reality beyond her own subjective experience and perspective. The following fragment begins with preliminary conclusions about her state of mind:

7. I am perhaps going insane. I must figure out this thing. I must murder him.

The explanation for her experience is that she is “perhaps going insane,” and it is true that such experiences of alienation, detachment from the social world, feelings of unreality, artificiality, and solipsism are consistent with, for example, early, prodromal stages of psychosis (see Sass 1994, 44–53; Sass & Pienkos 2013). Yet the “diagnosis” (“madness”) is just the beginning of her story: she still has the task of figuring out what is going on and why she feels like she does—and she has to commit the murder. The affect-filled, painful relationship with the man controls her experiential world: there is a curious combination of extreme solipsism and a deep connectedness to another. Let us look more closely at the narrator’s relation to the man, and the way she portrays him and imagines his experiences.

The Self and the Disturbing Other

1. […] He sits in company; I can see the light of the lamp on the chairs. I must murder him, I definitely must. He visits shops, he can see these colors and people, all this movement, these clouds, the gray, lustrous clouds. He must vanish, vanish.

As we have seen, the narrator’s mind is portrayed as continuously interacting with other people and the environment. Even though the storyworld is controlled by the narrator’s perspective and it is often uncertain whether she is perceiving, remembering or imagining something, the narration constantly “reaches out” and portrays the subject in relation to the world and others. Even the first lines of the novel direct the attention to the narrator’s relationship with the man. The narrator perceives the other as a living being who has a mind of his own and who is, just like her, situated in the world: he “sits in company,” “visits shops,” sees the same “colors and people” and “gray, lustrous clouds” as her. But the very fact that the man is alive, exists in the world and has experiences like her seems to drive her to murder: “He must vanish, vanish.”

The narrator addresses the problem of knowing what the man thinks and feels: she tries to infiltrate the man’s mind in her imagination, guess what he experiences. However, just like in real life, it is impossible for her to know exactly what the other person is going through: we only have access to our own thoughts, and we can only feel the sensations of our own bodies and perceive the world from our own perspective. The best means we have for understanding and connecting with others, as phenomenologists suggest, is the intercorporeal connection to others and the common world we share: usually we effortlessly perceive others’ experiences in their bodily expressions, gestures and movements, and understand one another based on our shared contexts (see Gallagher & Zahavi 2012, 204; 213). In Kaunis sielu, these basic forms of intersubjectivity are, however, becoming altered. The ordinary ways of relating to and understanding others are disrupted in the narrator’s experience, and her relation to the man is full of distress and extreme affects: “It is impossible that he lives here.”

Readers are likely to interpret the narrator’s emotions as a result of a failed love affair and the murder plan as her way of “freeing herself” from the man, as she herself states later (KS 36). However, the experiences are extreme even in this context and the narrator’s description pushes readers to imagine the complex affects and emotions (hate, love, disgust, rage) which tie us to other human beings and to reflect on the meanings produced by the emotions.

Even the way the narrator describes the man is strange. She depicts his bodily details, exaggerating them, even imagining things she could not possibly perceive or experience, for example the blood that is circulating in his veins:

3. I will kill him. It is a horrible mockery that he smiles, reaches out his hand. Blood circulates in his veins, his hair shines, I can see the top of his head. His eyes are moving, his stiff, gray-lashed eyes. I will kill him. He lives, every minute he lives. The whites of his eyes shine, he can reach out his hand. All the details in him are excruciating. It is these details that I hate in him. That his hair silently shines, punily just shines, excites me into fury. I will kill him.

3. Minä tapan hänet. On hirvittävää pilkkaa, että hän hymyilee, ojentaa kätsensä. Veri kiertää hänen suonissaan, hänen hiuksensa kiiltävät, näen päänkupuran, hänen silmänsä liikkuvat, kankeat,harmahtavari-

The description of the man grows into an exaggerated, aestheticized portrayal of the way his “stiff, gray-lashed eyes” are moving and the “whites of his eyes” and his hair are “shining.” The perspective on the man is utterly “unnatural”: he becomes a lump of flesh and body parts rather than a living person. She imagines his bodily details and creates an affective image, a horrifying portrait of him. The act of description also seems to make the man more and more alive, and increasingly disturbing. The more vivid he is in the narrator’s mind, the more rage he arouses in her. The details of his body are “excruciating,” his “shining hair” excites her “to fury.” On the other hand, once the narrator has made the decision that she will kill him, she describes a feeling of strangeness when she understands that he is, in fact, a “living creature”:

9. It feels strange now that I have decided to kill him. He is a living creature just like me. Strange, those hands, head, everything. We were walking in a garden, a group of women and men. He walked before me and now [sic] I thought: he does see the wide plantains growing by this road and the small grass, that lonely crooked lantern and the rocks next to the run-down hut. He sees, just like me. They raise thoughts in him […].

The narrator is experiencing a feeling of strangeness and wonder facing something that is obvious and normal from the perspective of the readers: that the man is alive, that he has thoughts and experiences, that he sees the same things as her. Then yet again, in the next fragment, the affect changes, and the narrator tells us that seeing the man eat a sandwich “horrifies” and “disgusts” her:

10. I cannot see him eat. I am horrified and disgusted when I see him taking a bite of his sandwich. I feel nauseous and awful, as if he already were a corpse.

The familiar being of the other becomes unfamiliar, even abject. In these two passages, the narrator’s relation to the man seems to be colored by her decision to kill him: it is suddenly strange that he is alive at all—or he is disgusting as if he were “already a corpse.”

The narrator’s emotions and affects are in constant flux, changing from horror and rage to wonder and disgust, revealing, but also exaggerating, some very basic structures of intersubjectivity and intercorporeality: the way we are affected by one another and the way we are at the same time separate and deeply tied to one another. For example, the disgust reveals a deep connection to the man: to be disgusted means to be affected by something one has rejected (see Kristeva 1982, 4; Ahmed 2004, 89). We are often disgusted by something that has once belonged to us or to the same world as us, by something we try to push away from us (like blood, hair, scraps of food, dead things—all things that the narrator mentions). The feeling of strangeness, in contrast, comes close to an experience of wonder in which the narrator suddenly sees the man “as if” for the first time (see Ahmed 2004, 179). The affective relationship to the man highlights the narrator’s altered experiential world. The narrator’s relationship to everything around her is filled with affect: everything is disturbing, everything triggers extreme emotions in her. Yet at the same time her world is completely solipsistic: there is no space for other people inside it.

As discussed, the overall structure of Kaunis sielu follows the logic of a diary or a confession, but soon after having introduced the reflective written form, the narrator starts to take liberties with it. She often describes her bodily movements and sensations at the same time as she is supposedly writing her text. In addition, she starts to narrate her experiences when she clearly is away from any writing equipment, for example in the presence of other people, even while talking to others. This results in an uncanny situation in which she reports the events “as they happen,” and readers become receivers of her “unmediated” thoughts—as if we were “inside” her mind. For example, in the same fragment, after her disgust about the man’s sandwich eating, she is listening to him talking about Tolstoy, but at the same time her mind is filled with violent urges. They are sitting at the same table, the narrator briefly mentions how the man appears content in his own explanations and literary expertise, but then focuses on her own bodily experiences and rage. From the readers’ perspective it is as if the man were not even there:

10. [...] My hands tremble. I will kill him. Will I right now wrench the lamp and throw it at him, in his face? I don’t really think about throwing the lamp. I have a feeling that I’ll wrench it from the table and throw it; there is a feeling in the air that this should happen, it would be natural to me, clear.

heitän, ilmassa on tuntu siitä, niin pitäisi käydä, se olisi luonnollista minulle, selvää. (KS 13.)

The narrator’s thoughts are tightly focused on her body and the affective atmosphere: “there is a feeling in the air” that she should throw the lamp at the man. There is no reflection, she just registers her momentary sensations. The simultaneity of narration and action in the passage breaks the logic of a written account, and it is full of affect. Portraying the narrator-protagonist’s rage and conveying it to the readers seems to be more important than keeping the appearance of the written form (or creating narrative coherence). Later in the novel, this simultaneity of narration and events becomes a repeated strategy: especially in the final chapters, Hämäläinen makes the narrator discard the rules of a written account completely and narrate in the present moment: recording experiences of the world in the present tense in a camera-like fashion as she is (or hallucinates) walking around Helsinki.

The novel creates a movement in which the readers are on the one hand invited to attune to the narrator’s experiences based on our experiential knowledge of affects and emotions—feelings of disgust, hate, love—and on the other hand propelled to distance ourselves from her as her experiences take morally questionable forms. The detailed description of bodily sensations is one of the main ways of creating this double effect.107 Extreme emotional states are familiar to everyone—but the narrator’s experiences go beyond anything usual, as in the following fragment in which the narrator is visiting an old lady but has to leave as violent thoughts fill her mind:

25. I am nervous. I often go pale suddenly. Madness, horrible madness overcomes me. I have the urge, when I see a yellow face, a fat, old body, to murder, to suddenly push a knife into a neck, exactly because of the dreadfulness, to see eyes flashing, dying, rolling wildly. I imagine all the horrible details. [...] It is strange that ugliness, hideousness always arouses desire in me, a vertigo of desire. Great contradictions always make me sensual. Shaking from fear and dizzy, horrified that someone would see my thoughts, I left.

107 As neurolinguistic research suggests, we go through similar responses when reading about (or imagining) bodily sensations and movements as when actually moving: action verbs, emotional language and bodily metaphors trigger somatosensory areas in readers’ brain (see Fischer and Zwaan 2008; also Kuzmičová 2014, 276). However, when engaging with fiction, we always know that the experiences described are not real: they are constructed inside the aesthetic frame.
pelosta ja tuntien pyörrytystä, kauhistuen, että ajatukseni nähtäisiin, lähindin. (KS 28.)

The narrator has an uncontrollable desire to murder: she imagines the details of cutting someone with a knife and states how “ugliness,” “hideousness” and “great contradictions” arouse desire in her. It is perhaps morally challenging for a reader to identify with the narrator’s description. Yet, the detailed description of bodily experiences solicits readers’ sensory imagination, and the aesthetic frame allows us to participate in these experiences. We may go through moral sentiments and ethical reflection, but we can also just enjoy the fiction and the emotions it evokes in the safe space provided by the aesthetic frame. In the passage, the narrator also evokes a fear of her thoughts “leaking” into the world. The final sentence contains a paranoid idea that someone might see her thoughts. The irony is that the readers actually do “see” them. Reading the novel, we literally are granted access to the narrator’s fictional mind.

Hämäläinen’s efforts in depicting extreme, subjective experiences and a mind torn in contradictions—“madness”—seems to have led her to develop these techniques and create a narrative form that is fragmentary, unsettling and affective, soliciting affective responses as well as diagnostic interpretations, but also leaving its readers puzzled, inviting us to reflect on how experiences can be narrated and the ways we encounter the minds of other beings. The purpose of Hämäläinen’s writing seems to be to see how the mind works in extreme affective states, how experiences emerge and are shaped in interaction with the world, what can be known and what we do not know about the others or even about ourselves. In the following, I shift the focus slightly and turn from the portrayal of the narrator’s “inner” experiential world to the way she portrays the physical environment around her and recounts the events of the murder (two things that are, however, intertwined): I discuss how the “outside” world is constructed and how the narrator’s perspective colors the world around her, especially in the murder scene.

2.2. The Solipsistic Mind and Construction of the “Outside” World

Description is an art to the degree that it gives us not just the world but the inner life of the witness. (Doty 2010, 65.)

Throughout the novel, it is difficult to separate the narrator’s experiential world from the (story)world she inhabits. On the one hand, everything that happens is “inside” the narrator’s mind or at least colored by her affective states; on the other, the narrator’s experiences and the “outside” world are mutually constructed. Even though the narration is often extremely solipsistic, the narrator does mention actual Helsinki streets, buildings, parks, and districts—III Linja, the National Theater, the Russian cemetery, Kaivopuisto, Toukola—and we can situate her in these (some are places that have remained almost unchanged much since the 1920s). In her later works like Katuojan vettä (Gutter Water, 1935) and Säädylleen murhenäytelmä (A Decent Tragedy, 1941) Hämäläinen becomes a skillful portrayer of Helsinki, and her interest in the city can be seen already in Kaunis sielu. However, in Kaunis sielu the description of the physical environment is constantly intertwined with the presentation of the narrator’s consciousness. In general, scenic description always implies some kind of perceiver, a perspective from which the world is seen (see also Doty 2010, 65). Especially in figural and first-person narration the borders between the presentation of “internal” consciousness and description of “external” environment often become hazy, as Cohn puts it (Cohn 1978, 133; 234). In a work like Kaunis sielu, the two have parallel functions: the presentation of consciousness (perceptions, imaginings, memories etc.) betrays the surrounding world, and the scenic description evokes the perceiving consciousness.

I discussed earlier how the perspective on the storyworld in Kaunis sielu is controlled by the narrator: the readers’ view into the world is very narrow and we are often as if “captives” inside the narrator’s perspective and experiences. Moreover, when the “outside” world is depicted, it is colored by the narrator’s mental reality. Her experiential world thus supersedes any social or consensus world there might be. In addition to the narrator’s relationships with the man and other people, this can be seen in the way the environment takes on affective meaning. For instance, the narrator depicts how a sad mood is infiltrating the city:

43. [...] Sadness hovers around these factories, trams and harbors. It rests in a pale, green leaf, in the black or gray air. There is something strong and sad, something formless in all of this, and it weighs on me.

43. [...] Näiden tehtaitten, raitiovaunujen, satamien ympärillä häälyyy surullisuus. Se on kalvakkaan vihreässä lehdessä, mustassa tai harmaassa ilmassa. Tässä kaikessa on jotakin väkevää ja surullista, jotain hahmottumataontaa, joka painaa minua. (KS 45–46.)

The passage is an evocative description of the way emotions, moods and atmospheres always color our perceptions and experiences of being in the world. Yet again, a few fragments later, this common, intuitively graspable experience is taken to extremes as it is given a morally questionable meaning. The narrator’s affective states are projected onto the city when she has bought the gun with which she plans to kill her lover. In the passage, the narrator confesses that she has left something out of her story and now “comes clean” to her readers:
52. I have left unmentioned something important: the day he returned, I bought a gun. I carry it with me always. Even though I often feel strange when I walk with the gun in my pocket in the middle of these clayish gray bushes and worn-out fields of grass. But it is only amongst them that it feels strange, not in the tram or when I am walking on the street. There is something similar in the fervor that I feel as I am carrying the gun or thinking about it as in these plastered houses, paved streets, nervous neon lights and billboards. Same fervor and same insane restlessness.

52. Olen jättänyt mainitsematta tärkeän seikan: hänen tulopäivänään ostin aseen, se on aina mukanani. Tosin minusta tuntuu usein oudolta kuljeskella se taskussa näiden savenharmaiden pensaiden ja kuluneiden ruohikkojen keskellä. Mutta vain niiden keskellä sen pitäminen taskussa ja yleensä sen kuuluminen minulle tuntuukin oudolta, ei enää istuessani raitiovaunussa tai kulkiasan kadulla. Sen kantamisessa mukanani ja sitä ajatellessani usein herääväää kiihkoa on samaa kuin näässä rapatuissa taloissa, kive- tyissä kaduissa, hermostuneissa valoissa ja reklameissa, samaa kiihkoa ja järjetöntä rauhattomuutta. (KS 52–53.)

Once again, we can understand the experience based on our own experiences of moods, atmospheres and our “affective scaffolding” in the world (see Colombetti & Krueger 2015). As phenomenologists note, objects like clothes, bags, books, and diaries give us support and help us to navigate the world (see, e.g., Merleau-Ponty 2002, 166). But the fact that the experience is evoked through holding a gun and planning a murder likely creates a distance between the readers and narrator. We can understand how carrying a gun changes a person’s affective being in the world and her perception, but at the same time the experience is unsettling in many social and moral ways. Furthermore, the narrator makes a connection between the city and her affective state while carrying the gun: the city streets, neon lights, and billboards have the “same fervor and same insane restlessness” as the weapon.

The solipsism of the narrator’s world is emphasized by the fact that the narrative consists almost solely of the narrator’s own thoughts, emotions, reflections, and her perceptions of the environment. No voices or perspectives of any other characters are allowed to interrupt the incessant reports and reflections of the narrator. She recounts having occasional conversations with other people (her lover explaining things to her, “Miss A.,” “sculptor T.,” “Master S.,” a doctor at the hospital, a landlady, a deaconess, and finally a prostitute who helps her when she is ill), but their words are almost never cited, not even paraphrased.108 There is no intersubjective corroboration—such as other characters seeing the same things as her—that would help readers decide whether 108 Early in the novel the narrator repeats a few words from “Maisteri S,” but it is not until the very end that a very short dialogue breaks the narrator’s monologue. A girl (a prostitute) comes to help the narrator when she is ill, and the narrator briefly cites her words: “Good day. Has the deaconess been there, she asks cautiously.” (“– Hyvää päivää. Onko diakonissa the narrator is “correct” in her perceptions or whether she is imagining or hallucinating even more than she tells or realizes. However, I would argue that this does not make readers distance themselves from the narrator. Rather, the uncertainty binds us together: we are both in the same situation, trying to make sense of what is happening, what is real, and what is not. As the narrator is searching for meanings for her experiences and actions, she gives different interpretations for the things she reports—simultaneously hinting at different possible courses of events. Let us now look at the way she narrates the climactic events.

A Story of a Murder

The murder is depicted for the first time in Chapter IV in the middle of the novel. The description is given in the past tense, creating an impression that it is reported from the hospital where the narrator continues her story in the following chapter. However, the description of the environment is detailed and evocative, creating a sense of presence. The narrator reports the events from the perspective of the experiencing I and there is very little self-reflection. She describes being with her lover at the Russian cemetery. It is raining, they are naked, and suddenly she understands that there are corpses beneath them:

53. The road was a little bit clayey, the alder grove was bluish. We were at the Russian cemetery. The wind blew white mugworts on my face, I could see the frail, flickering shadow of a stalk of grass on his cheek. The rain pattered against our naked skin, a horrible storm was raging above our heads in the trees. Suddenly I remembered with horror that there was a decaying corpse under us, an eyeless, cheekless dead body that could not defend itself against our violation. Perhaps a corpse of a small beloved child, or of a pure youth, or of an elderly person. I moved, got up. He looked astonished and a little bit scornful. I raised the gun and fired.

53. Tie oli hiukan savista, lepikkö sinersi. Olimme venäläisellä hautausmaalla. Tuuli pieksi valkeata marunaa kasvoillessa, hänen poskellaan näkyi siro, häilyvä heinän varjo. Sade rapisi alastomalle iholle, päidemme päällä kiisi puissa hirveä myrsky. Äkkiä muistin kauhistuen, että allamme makasi mätänevä ruumis, silmätöön, posketon vainaja, joka ei voinut puolustautua käynyt siellä, hän kysyy varovasti.”) (KS 129.) One could even argue that the other characters do not exist in the storyworld but are hallucinated or imagined by the narrator. However, she tends to make explicit when she hallucinates or imagines something, and it makes more sense to regard the other characters who are not framed as hallucinations or imaginings as actual in the storyworld.

In this sense, the narrator’s unreliability (the fact that we do not know whether what she recounts is true in the storyworld or not) is a form of “bonding unreliability” (Phelan 2007, 223–224): it does not distance the readers from her, but rather points toward the fallibility that is part of the human condition. As Greta Olson (2003, 96) would put it, the narrator is “fallible” (sometimes mistaken in her account and often in her interpretations) but not “untrustworthy” (deviating from the norms implicit in the text).
The description creates a curious combination of realism and horror elements: the narrator depicts carefully her perceptions and sensations, focusing on the mugworts, the shadow of a stalk of grass on the man’s cheek and the drops of rain on their bodies—while at the same time imagining dead bodies in the graves under them and seeing a storm “raging” in the sky. Readers are invited to oscillate between a realist (psychological) reading and reading of the text as a horror story, maintaining both a mimetic and an aesthetic frame of interpretation simultaneously.

The narrator’s feeling of solipsism and strangeness of the outside world is then culminated in the murder scene. After firing the gun, she recounts that: “I felt that I was the only one who heard the sound [of the gun] and that no one else could have heard it even if they had stood next to me.” There is a feeling of absolute loneliness: as if the narrator was the only person in the world. The experience can be read psychologically: the narrator is so detached from the social world that she cannot even imagine that others would hear the same things as her. However, the experience could also be understood as a hint about the fictional nature of the story: the solipsism of the narrator’s world also means that the murder might actually be a product of her imagination or hallucination—an interpretation to which I return shortly.

When the man is dead, the narrator recounts how she stayed at the cemetery, speaking to him as if he were still alive and not understanding what had happened. She describes how she felt blood on her hand but believed that it was dew and fell asleep next to the man. When she wakes up, she appears to have forgotten the murder and does not at first seem to notice the dead man at her side. The bloody hand and the gun serve for her as proofs that she has committed the murder. She recounts how she was first filled with pity and love for the man and how she covered the man’s corpse with her scarf and jacket. Then she describes a feeling of estrangement and indifference and finally even anger, offering an image of the man in heaven while she is “condemned” in the social world:

54. [...] Slowly he started to feel strange to me. I did not feel anything special for him anymore. He was in different hands and I even felt hostility to him thinking that he was now there, sleeping beautifully in the sun [...]. And I am condemned in everyone’s eyes and everyone thinks and talks about me harshly.

110 “53. [...] Minusta tuntui, että kuulin äänen yksinäni ja ettei kuukaan toinen olisi sitä kuullut, vaikka olisi seissyt vieressäni.” (KS 55.)
Once again, she reports a chain of contradicting emotions. The most prevailing feeling in the end is that she is condemned by other people (this is something that the narrator repeats several times elsewhere111). The narrator thus seems to accept the moral codes of the society, her experience is shaped by the social norms, and the world seems to return to its regular “place” for a moment.

In the following fragment, she reports how she went to a hospital near the cemetery and turned herself in to a doctor: “I told him my thing, he looked at me as if he thought that I was delusional. I showed him my bloody hand and repeated the same again.”112 The blood functions again as a proof, but it remains unclear whether the doctor believes her or not: once again, there is only the narrator’s report of the conversation and her speculation about the meaning of the doctor’s gaze. The description of her bodily experience and the environment is once again evocative, creating a sense of presence:

55. [...] I spoke slowly, monotonously and with strange halts, my eyes felt weirdly stiff and immobile, the whole time I was staring at the same spot. I remember well the spot on the wall, a tile was very blackened, it was as if my eyes were hanging on it.

She describes a strangeness in her speech and a feeling of heaviness and stiffness in her perception. The narration lacks congruence, emphasizing the sense of strangeness. She then says that she is unable to remember the rest of the events: “At this point there is a blank space in my thoughts. I cannot remember any events, as if I had not lived at all during that time.”113 The chapter ends, and the resulting break in the text emphasizes the narrator’s loss of memory.

In the following chapter, the story continues from the hospital: “I have been placed under surveillance, there is uncertainty about my state of mind 111 Early in the novel, she mentions her love for the song of birds, puddles, grass, a dog, and says that she is “condemned amongst human beings” (“ihmisten kesken tuomittu”) (KS 14–15), and when she talks about the sensuality of her imagined devils and dreams about “Miss L.” she feels that she is “wrongly condemned” (“väärin tuomittu”) (KS 38).

112 “55. [...] Sanoin asiani hänelle, hän katsoi minun kuin olisi ajatellut minun hourailevan, näytin veristä kättäni ja toistin saman uudelleen.” (KS 58.)
113 “55. [...] Tällä kohtaaj ajatukissani on tyhjä tila. En muista mitään tapahtumia, aivan kuin en olisi sitä aikaa elänytkään.” (KS 58.)
Chapter 2: A Mind in a World

[...].”¹¹⁴ In the hospital, the narrator suddenly resumes the diary-like form, suggesting that the story is written down as it evolves: “My illness feels repulsive to me, I cannot look at my pallid, thin hands. I draw my sleeves until my fingertips to hide them, although it is difficult to write. [...] All right, I think I must stop now. They are coming with their dosage.”¹¹⁵ Ultimately we do not get much information about what happens during her stay in the hospital (which apparently lasts from fall to the following spring): the narrator focuses on her experiences, and fragments 56 to 75 consist of a collection of memories, hallucinations, and fantasies. She continues to reflect on how her perception of the man changed after the murder, how he turned from someone who needed to be destroyed into someone who had a life of his own:

63. [...] I forgot that he too saw the swaying grass, the blue dusk between them, the plantains on the ground that was filled with broken pieces of tile. I forgot that he too saw the round, convex leaves [...]. I did not think that he too thought about the air, about the birch by the road, about the pile of board, about the gray sky. I only saw him as a creature that needed to be destroyed; I did not think that he had a thin coat and a pocket that was patched with a thread that was too light-colored; that he had ink in his fingers after writing... I did not think. [...] He was not just a disturbing thing that had to be destroyed. His arms, his head became alive, dear to me the moment he died. [...] I remember a pool of water by the gravestone and the blood that had bled on the sand and the grass.

63 [...] Unohdin, että hänkin näki huojuvat heinät, sinisen hämyn niitten välissä, ratamot tilinsirpaleita täynnä olevalla maalla. Unohdin, että hänkin näki pyöreäät, kupertuneet lehdet [...]. En ajattellut, että hänkin ajatteli ilmaa, koivua tien vieressä, lautatarhaa, harmaata taivasta. Minä näin hänet vain olentonä, joka piti hävittää, en ajattellut, että hänellä on ohut takki, jonka tasku on parsittu liian vaalealla langalla, että hänellä oli mustetta sormissaan kirjoitettu jäljiltä... En ajattellut. [...] Hän ei ollut vain hävitettävä seikka, joka häiritsi. Hänen käsivartensa, päänsä tuli minulle elävaksi, kalliiksi sillä hetkellä, kun hän kuoli. [...] Muistan vesilammikon hautakiven luona ja hiedalle ja nurmeen vuotaneen veren. (KS 65–66.)

She realizes again (as she had after the decision to kill him) that the man, too, was a living, thinking creature who had an experiential world of his own: he perceived the world around him, he had thoughts, he had a jacket, a pocket, and some ink on his fingers. Details that earlier made him disgusting or strange now make him familiar and human. When the man is gone, the hate, violent urges, and desires disappear, and the intersubjective reality and its norms seem to return to their regular places. The murder loses its affective meaning, and the social and ethical meanings take control of the narrator’s mind. The desired result is not achieved: “Why did I murder him and not myself? [...] Everything has been pointless.”

¹¹⁴ “56. Minut on asetettu tarkastelun alaiseksi, ollaan epätietoisia mielentilastani.” (KS 59.)
¹¹⁵ “59. [...] Sairauteni tuntuu minusta vastenmieliseltä, kelmeitä, laihoja käsiäni en siedä katsella, kätkökseeni vedän painaamahkan aina sormenpäihin asti, tosin siten on vaikea kirjoittaa. [...] Kas niin, nyt minun täytyy kai lopettaa, tulevat annoksensa kanssa.” (KS 62–63.)

At the end of the hospital chapter, the narrator tells us that she has wanted to hurt herself and that she is experiencing rage attacks, but she is not sure whether she has faked them:

75. Some rage attacks, during which I had an urge to mutilate my body. I do not understand myself if I have faked these seizures, because I felt that what I did was wrong and insane, but when I then noticed—I happened to think in that moment—that I might be set free because of the seizures, that I might again see the gray fence above which branches with shiny buds were circling in the wind quietly in the spring, dropping down brown bark and red flowers, and I could see the streets at night-time; I remembered clearly on which street and in which corner the pavement was most shiny with wear... When I remembered all this, I let the seizures continue, I even decorated them the way I wanted, I conjured up armies of mice, I let them zigzag on my bed, dash through my hands and I cried with fear and pleasure as I was trying to catch them, I talked about small hats and devils. The result was that I was released.

The narrator recounts how she started to “decorate” her seizures with “armies of mice” and talk about “small hats” and “devils” (both have appeared in her thoughts earlier), and ultimately reveals that she has been released because of this. In the end, she is herself confused whether she is in fact “bad” or “mad”: “Did I have pangs of conscience because of these proceedings? No. I have a low and criminal character, and perhaps it is even true that I am a spiritually ill person.”

116 “67. Miksi minä murhasin hänet enkä itseäni? [...] Kaikki on ollut tarkoituksetonta.” (KS 70.)
117 “75. [...] Tunsinko tunnunvaiwoja tästä menettelyystäni? En. Minä olen alhainen ja rikollinen luonne ja kenties todellakin henkisesti sairas ihminen.” (KS 79.)
The story about the murder reveals once again both the narrator’s solipsism and the way her emotions and affects are constructed in interaction with the world: her solipsism and affective states color the world, but they are also shaped by it.

Aesthetic, Imaginary, and Hallucinatory Worlds

One possible direction for understanding the narrator’s curious release from the hospital is to interpret that she is actually released not because she is considered “mad,” but because the murder never happens: because she either imagines or hallucinates it. The interpretation is supported by the many surreal, grotesque, and horrific elements of the murder scene: meeting the lover at a cemetery during a heavy storm, imagining the corpses in the graves. It also gets support from the narrator’s hint about the doctor’s disbelief when she goes to the hospital (where she is perhaps admitted rather because of pneumonia she said she has caught than because of her supposed crime). The whole story about the murder has strong connotations with a romantic horror story, reminding us of the narrator’s interest in fiction and imagining (in fact, later the narrator links the murder plans to the “trashy literature” she says her lover liked to read).

As we have seen, the narrator constantly imagines things, dramatizes events, and modifies and “decorates” the world in her imagination. While hospitalized, she even comes to the conclusion that the reason why she committed the murder is, in addition to the pride and disgust she felt, just lack of respect and “frivolous artistry”:

71. [...] I am not actually evil or malevolent, I just have no ability to respect anything, and now I know why I committed the murder: out of artistry, out of the beauty of gloom and melancholy. In order to make myself beautiful with features I don’t have: courage, determination, and blazing, excited virtuousness. I did it because of pride and disgust, but also because of frivolous artistry.

71. [...] Minä en varsinaisesti ole paha enkä ilkeämielinen, minä en vain osaa mitään kunnioittaa, ja nyt tiedän miksi murhankin tein: taiteellisuudesta, synkkyyden ja murheellisuuden kauneudesta, kaunistaakseni itseni ominaisuuksilla, joita minulla ei ole: rohkeudella, päätäväisydellä, leimuavalla, inokkaalla hyveellisydellä. Ylpeydestä ja inhosta mutta myös kevytmielisestä taiteellisuudesta sen tein. (KS 76.)

She has already called the murder “blazing,” “bold,” and a “decisive, striking act” (KS 21; 35–36; 65), and here she describes it with other words signaling both efforts at control and aestheticism: she connects the crime to the “beauty” of “gloom and melancholy” and says that she wanted to make herself “beautiful” with “courage, determination, and blazing, excited virtuousness”—features she “does not have.” In the end, the murder seems to be an act of melancholic “beauty” and “artistry”—connecting the narrator to the dilettantes and aestheticists of decadent literature on the one hand, and on the other, to the Dostoevskian underground man and the tradition of abject heroes (in this, she resembles the narrator of Tohtori Finckelman, see 3.2). The hint about artistry could be taken even one step further: to read the whole murder story as an exercise in aesthetic imagination and as an effort to gain control and agency through art.

The solipsistic, affective world of the narrator is very much a world of aesthetics and imagination. The narrator is an artist living in her own world, together with the devils that she starts to imagine early on—and that “require cultural surroundings.” It is even possible to read the act of “madness” as an act of artistic performance, as the narrator herself suggests in the rage scene which, she says, lead to her release from the hospital. Toward the end, she also starts to position herself in the place of God as a creator. Like at the beginning with the fat woman and in the hospital with the mice and the little hats, she starts to enhance her perceptions and add things to the world she perceives. She sees a vanload of furniture on the street and focuses her attention on a table that is on top of the load. She starts to imagine the table in a room, with a flower on it, and decides to add more flowers:

85. […] I imagine also a few old fuchsias on the table. In my mind I stretch the narrow elliptical leaves, they become long, unnaturally long and hanging, so that they fall from the windowsill and I give them a bright blue color. Now the whole plant resembles a tuft of hay, delicate, sensitive and emotional, somewhere in a field. The leaves are wet, disgustingly wet, they are accumulated on top of each other […]. I say to God: Yes, You have created the lilac leaves, the stones at the shore and the crooked branches. You have created the movement of the branches. The colors. Even the blue. I give You full recognition for them, but You have not created this tuft, not one single straw of hay in it. It is mine and I take it with me anywhere, I plant it above the gate or on my desk or keep it in my drawer. You have not created it.

118 “Piru vaatii kulttuuriympäristöä, niin juuri, kulttuuriympäristöä.” (KS 97.)
Chapter 2: A Mind in a World

As an artist she has an enormous power and freedom: she is as powerful as God whom she defies. In her imagination, she is an omnipotent creator of affective worlds and images, transgressing all the constraints of her gender.

In the end, it becomes clear that more important than what “actually happens” in the story is the process in which the narrator creates imaginary and/or hallucinatory worlds and scenes and invites her readers to go through them together with her. As we have seen, the borders between the narrator’s world and the actual world she inhabits are hazy, and the readers’ task is to follow the narrator’s perceptions, fantasies, dreams, and the imaginary worlds she creates. Toward the end of the novel, the story becomes more and more detached from the logics and rules of reality, more and more surreal or hallucinatory: the narrator is wandering around Helsinki severely ill, she goes through aesthetic experiences and experiences of bodily decay, tries to make her peace with God, and finally even seems to narrate her own death. There is an immense pleasure and immense suffering. In fact, it is important to note that the narrator’s experiential world is one of both imagination and illness. Despite her moments of omnipotence as a creator of flowers and tussocks of hay, she goes through experiences of intense suffering. There is a constant tension between the narrator’s freedom as an artist/creator and the way her experiences, actions, even imaginings are shaped and controlled without her volition and cause her pain.

Ultimately the novel directs our attention to the ways the social, intersubjective world—the social and religious norms, scripts, and narratives—and the restrictions and possibilities afforded by the world shape both the narrator’s experiences and her efforts in artistic creation. In addition to the narrator’s relationship to the world and other people (especially the man), Kaunis sielu invites its readers to ask questions about creating art and the possibilities underlying it: Who can be an artist? Who gets a voice and what can be represented? If we interpret the narrator as a female artist who makes art by killing (or imagining or hallucinating killing) her male lover (“the beauty of gloom and melancholy”; “frivolous artistry”), the question then is: what is the symbolic meaning of the murder? Is the act of violence needed to be able to tell the story, to create art? What do the experiences of pain, suffering, and “madness” mean in all this? I return to the narrator’s artistic and social transgressions (as well as the transgression Hämäläinen enacts by writing a novel like Kaunis sielu) at the end of the chapter, but before that, let us look more closely at the affective patterns the narrator’s imagination and hallucinations make: the thoughts and images which both distress her and bring her pleasure, and the way her experiences are shaped by social norms and cultural narratives.
2.3. Affective Patterns and Shaping Norms

As we have seen, the reason why the narrator needs to tell her story is that she cannot understand herself: she recognizes that she has experiences that she cannot explain or sometimes even verbalize, and she labels these as “mad.” There is something that she does not know and that she cannot control. Perhaps most interesting, and most difficult, in Kaunis sielu is the way the narrator evokes different affects and emotions one after another, constantly offering new interpretations for her experiences and for the murder and rejecting old ones. In different fragments, the narrator gives as reasons for the murder: “disgust”; “hurt pride” (KS 14; 48; 109); “lust”; “shame”; “contempt”; “hate” (KS 48); “pride, disgust and love”; “anxiety and confusion” (KS 59–60); “artistry” (KS 76); “sorrow” (because the man allowed other people to frown upon on her) (KS 109); “passion,” “contradictions,” “sensitivity and desire for revolt,” “hate” and “gloominess” (KS 111–112).

The emotions create affective patterns which show the way the narrator is attuned to and sensitized by the world: on the one hand, she goes through pleasurable fantasies and experiences of wonder and shapes the world in her imagination, on the other, her experiences are deeply affected and shaped by the social world, other people and socio-cultural norms and narratives. The narrator is, following narrative theorist Hanna Meretoja (2018, 100), “entangled in narrative webs.” The portrayal of her constantly changing affects and emotions reveals that when she cannot fit into societal norms, she goes through experiences of pain and suffering. In the following, I first look at the different associations the narrator’s mind makes (her “random” thoughts about ears and dead children, love for nature, and desire for devils), then I turn to the topics of queer shame and pleasure, and to the fragmentary narrative form the narrator ultimately creates.

Unconscious Associations and Affective Engagements

The unconscious cannot be seen directly or even indirectly. The way to catch it is slant, by noticing how consciousness makes patterns and [trying] to figure out what motivates those patterns. (Vermeule 2015, 471.)

In addition to the emotions and affective states the narrator names and reflects on, there are ineffable and unconscious experiences which are revealed rather in the movements of the narrator’s mind than in what she explicitly says or writes.

Meretoja elaborates on Mark Freeman’s (2002; 2010, 95–123) notion of the “narrative unconscious”: the ways different kinds of cultural narratives affect unconsciously the way we perceive ourselves, narrate our experiences, and understand our possibilities for future (see Meretoja 2018, 18–20; 98–100).
As Vermeule notes, the unconscious cannot be seen directly or even indirectly, nor can it be quoted or verbalized (see also Cohn 1978, 88). It can only be hinted at by a narrator who has knowledge that a character does not, or interpreted by readers from a character’s associative thoughts, (inner) monologues and speech. In the case of Kaunis sielu, there is no knowledgeable, omniscient narrator who would have the power to reveal the protagonist’s unconscious to us; the narrator has little more knowledge about herself than the readers. All we have are the patterns the narrator’s consciousness makes while she tries to arrange her story: the affective movement between the self and the world; the associations and the story patterns which show the narrator both shaping the world and being shaped by it.

As we have seen, much of the narrator’s experiential world is controlled by thoughts and emotions that seem to just “appear” without any conscious effort and even without the narrator’s control: experiences that move her and connect her to her surroundings. As early as the first chapter, the narrator highlights the movements her mind makes and consciously reflects on these “trivial, obscene and strange” thoughts:

14. [...] There are trivial, obscene and strange thoughts flickering in my mind. I suddenly remember ears, red, thick ear lobes. They whirl in my mind. Ears have always aroused me sensually, especially if they are red, soft, big. Firm lobes that are detached from the head make me sensitive, light, glad. They make me spiritual. Tolstoy and France have compared these kinds of ears to butterfly wings.

She reports the images that appear in her mind (“ears, red, thick ear lobes”) and reflects on the emotions and associations they raise in her (“they arouse me sensually”; “they make me sensitive, light, glad”; “spiritual”; “Tolstoy and France”; “butterfly wings”). The reports are offered also for the readers to reflect on and interpret: to construct a narrative out of the movements of the mind, as discussed earlier. The narrator does not herself know what the images “mean” in terms of words and symbols, but she does recognize their affective meaning and what they do to her. No explanations are given: we are as puzzled and amazed facing the narrator’s experiences as she is.

---

120 E.g., in the psycho- or self-narration of a knowledgeable third or first-person narrator, or in quoted or autonomous monologues (Cohn 1978, 88).
Right after the ears, she mentions how she suddenly starts to imagine a dead child and then seems to “wake up” from her thoughts:

14. [...] All of this flickers in my mind. Then comes a completely insane thought about a dead child, as if the child had been mine and then died. [...]
I notice with a start how weird it is that I think like this, it is as if I was only half conscious, as if I was dreaming, thinking my own thoughts at the same time.
Do you understand? (KS 16.)

14. [...] Tämä kaikki välähtelee nyt mielessäni. Sitten tulee aivan järjetön ajatus kuolleesta lapsesta, niin kuin lapsi olisi ollut minun ja sitten kuollut. [...]
Huomaan säpsähtäen miten omituista on, että näin ajattelen, olen kuin vain puoliksi tajuissani, ikään kuin näkisin unta ajatellen omia ajatuksiani samalla.
Käsitättekö? (KS 16.)

She notes that it is as if she were “only half conscious,” “dreaming and thinking at the same time.” As the fragment continues, so does the movement from one thought to another, and she again returns to an image or a memory of the man sitting at a table. An association is created between her hate for her lover and an event from her childhood:

14. [...] I want to take all this away from him. Good God, that is how it is. No lamp can light up his face, he cannot sit at any table. Suddenly I remember how once, when I was a child, I went for a visit. I remember clearly the big burs growing by the road. There was a big bush of them, the leaves were so white on one side. Mother had an infant then and she was nursing it.

The image of the man sitting at the table suddenly triggers a childhood memory. The narration hints at how the mind makes associations and how a person’s thoughts (and actions) may be guided by an unknown logic. Readers are not offered any clear clues as to how to interpret the moves from the thoughts about the ears to the butterfly wings and to the dead child and from the man to the memory of the mother nursing a child. There is only the question in the middle of the associations: “Do you understand?” The text invites us to interpret the affective images and associations as expressions of the narrator’s “unconscious” but leaves their meaning open.
Exploring the associative patterns of thought, Hämäläinen develops what could be called a “psychoanalytical technique.” She likely created the technique instinctively, not knowing very much about Freudian theories of the unconscious but rather focusing on the insight that there are experiences that cannot be put into words, that escape meaning and defy explanation, and that guide subjects without them consciously knowing it. However, to return to a point I have been making throughout the analysis, not even the efforts to present the unconscious focus on the “inside” of the narrator’s mind. Rather, unconscious processes are brought forth in the narrator’s relationship with the world and other people, in the thoughts and images they raise in her, as well as in her bodily reactions. They are manifested in the narrator’s incapability to control her thoughts, emotions, and bodily reactions. By transposing into words the images in her mind, the associations the mind makes, her bodily experiences and affective responses to the world, the narrator hints at something that is either impossible to verbalize or on the edge of verbalization.

The affective patterns the narrator creates—attaching herself to the world with feelings of love, hate, disgust and pleasure—are also intended to solicit readers’ bodily experiences and sensory imagination. We are invited to follow her thoughts, emotions, reflections, and interaction with the world. The intersubjective and interaffective experiences discussed throughout this chapter have mostly been negative and unsettling. Yet, there are also many instances in which the narrator goes through feelings of compassion and being in harmony with the world. These moments of togetherness and belonging are hardly ever connected to other people, but rather to nature or animals and objects. The narrator encounters a wild dog, malnourished pigs, a basket, and an enamel lid which raise experiences of love and tenderness in her: “I have sought refuge in animals. [...] They feel close to me, I love them, I show kindness to them without hesitation.”; “That blue enamel lid—a piece is missing [...]. I feel tenderness for it.” The narrator’s empathy for animals and objects while feeling alienated from the social world, being an outsider, are also ways to invite empathic responses in readers and convey the affective meaning of the narrator’s experiences. A strong contrast is developed between the world of plants, animals, and objects and the social, human world, as the narrator states:

22. [...] I love birds nowadays, they are cheerful and devout. All rooms, the tram, the crowd arouse a feeling of horror in me. I must escape.

121 This resonates with the phenomenological understanding of the unconscious not as a “hidden depth” of the psyche but manifested in the body memory and in the lived world of the subject (see Fuchs 2012).
122 On the functions of material objects in inviting story-driven experiences and empathy in modernist literature, see Oulanne 2018.
123 “Olen turvaunut eläimiin. [...] Tunnen ne itselleni läheisiksi, rakastan niitä, osoitan niille hyvyyttä arkailematta.” (KS 22); “Tuo sinervä emalikansi—siitä on lohjennut pala [...] Tunnen hellyyttä sitä kohtaan” (KS 45).
Fictions of Madness

I love dogs, I often kiss the icy tree bark and when I am paralyzed with fear and I still see a round branch of a pine tree that looks round because of the posture of the bent needles, I feel healthy, sane and peaceful. The needles are very blue, they shine, and they are clean.

The rooms, trams and crowds seem to (unconsciously) remind the narrator of the world from which she is estranged, and at the same time she goes through experiences of aesthetic pleasure engaging with nature. When the narrator feels alienated from the social world, she often takes refuge in nature, in her hallucinations, dreams, and imagination where she can go through thoughts and emotions that are condemned or repressed in the shared interpersonal world.

This becomes most visible in her fantasies about the devils.124 They first appear in Fragment 22, just before the description of the love for birds and dogs. The narrator introduces the creatures, telling that one of them is “sad, thin, and it has wide bat legs,” a second has a “rosy face,” and a third has “the dull face of a peasant”; she knows it is “madness,” but she “has to think about them”.125 In Fragment 23, she emphasizes that she knows that they are imaginary—she does not see them with her “bodily eyes”—but she feels painful pleasure imagining them:

23. My weird pastime still is that I see devils in my thoughts. I don’t see them with my bodily eyes; I just have a curious desire to imagine them. I feel that it is madness that I think about them, but yet I do. It has become an entertainment for me; I can’t stop it, and still I feel that it somehow 124 The devils are a source of intertextual references and allusions in Kaunis sielu. The narrator lists different images of devils and discusses their meanings, creating a small, associative “essay” on the cultural representations of the devil. One important reference is Ivan Fyodorovich Karamazov (Brothers Karamazov, 1880) and his devil that is, as the narrator mentions, one of very few that she as ever seen clothed. She also wonders: “To defame the devil, we attach a tail to its back, we give it horns, a hairy body. We give it the features of an animal. Why animal? Why do we think that animals are filthy?” (“Häväistäksemme kiinnitämme piriulle hännän, otsaan sarvet, ruumiiseen karvan. Annamme sille eläinominaisuksia. Miksi eläinten, miksi eläimet meistä ovat saastasia?”) (KS 74). The detailed, warm and humoristic descriptions of devils could also be compared to Finnish painter Hugo Simberg’s paintings in which little devils live their lives amongst people, and in her memoir Hämäläinen mentions the influence of Simberg’s works on her poetry (Hämäläinen & Haavikko 1993, 198). Like for Simberg, the devils the narrator of Kaunis sielu imagines are a mixture of good and evil, happy and sad, poor and rich: some of them are wounded and pitiful, some are old and disgusting—they are grotesque but also quite easy to like.

125 “laiha, surullinen, sillä on leveät, lepakon siiven tapaiset jalat”; “ruusuiset kasvor”; “eräällä talonpojan tyhmä naama”; “Hulluutta tämä kaikki on, tiedän. Mutta minun on nitä ajateltava.” (KS 23.)
splinters my brain. I feel a strange pain in my head, but at the same time my mind is filled with great, impassionate joy. The thoughts about murder disappear when I imagine devils, although they are somehow related. I tremble, I become sweaty; everything feels infinitely painful. […] I have decorated my room with these devils, two of them are sitting side by side like two owls in my bookshelf; they are still and sit there for a long time. The lumpy, hairy bodies of the devils and their evil nature has always aroused an immense desire in me to couple with a devil, or some other creature like it, in a filthy way, in a deliberately filthy and pleasurable way. […] I know all the time that they do not exist; I don’t see them, I am healthy in that sense, but they appear before my eyes; they gain features that I don’t invent, but slowly I think about them as if they really existed.

Imagining the devils sitting in her room, the narrator creates a detailed fantasy of having intercourse with a devil—a fantasy that seems intended to shock her readers. Soon after this, she starts to offer small hints at another desire which is even more shocking to herself: a desire for women. A meaning for her affective experiences and the patterns they make is beginning to emerge. Let us look more closely at the narrator’s descriptions of her desire and love for women.

Feelings of Queer Shame and Pleasure

31. […] But even if my act was only caused by illness, I don’t want to leave it undone because it still is blazing, bold. It means that I am set free from the past. I am set free from the past, not because he ceases to exist (he cannot move, think—nothing happens to him anymore) but because I will perform a condemnable, yet a decisive, striking act. I will raise myself from this depression that is caused by my indecisiveness and the fact that I have not been able to act until now. I will also become free from disgust that I cannot bear, the disgust that overcomes me when I see his wife talking, dressing, carrying the child. Every moment I feel that we are attached to one another in a disgusting way. It is as if I saw her white thighs. And the most unnatural thing, which raises a sweat on my forehead and dizzies me, is that I feel desire for her white thighs.

This is my most horrible, most secret suffering. We are all horrifying, if we truly see ourselves.

As discussed, the narrator’s reason for telling her story is to find a meaning for her state of distress and for her murderous thoughts. Even before the description of the murder, the narrator offers several different interpretations for her experiences and the act of violence she plans. In the long reflection quoted above, she states that she needs to commit the murder because she must set herself “free.” Even if it were caused by an illness, the murder would be a “decisive, striking act” which would raise her from the “depression caused by indecisiveness.” She also says that she wants to free herself from the disgust she feels when watching the man with his wife, and after stating this, she reveals—as an afterthought—that the thighs of the wife arouse desire in her, revealing the source of her extreme distress. It becomes clear that in the background of her murderous thoughts and disgust at the man, is a mesh of complex, conflicting affects and emotions.

Once the desire for women has been revealed, it is aligned with the devils. Two different kinds of “forbidden” desires are brought together:

34. My devils have become sensuous, I notice frivolity and restlessness in them. There has been a progress into a wrong, unnatural direction. Today I met small Miss L. […] I watched her and suddenly I thought that if I kissed that hair, those hands and that slender, sad tiny mouth and face, I would feel pleasure, tenderness, joy and lust that I have never felt for example when kissing him. […] I have felt intoxication, shining joy, enjoyable sensuality, vibrations and passionate, joyous desires only when looking at naked female bodies in paintings […] I shall never do anything, I am appalled by the mere thought of it, but I know that I will always be eating dry bread while the others take delight in juicy, bright fruits. I have been wrongly robbed of this joyful, wonderful drink. [...] I am wrongly condemned. Is it me who has to walk these gray, matter-of-fact regions?

The narrator describes her desire for “Miss L.” as “unnatural” and says that the thought of her doing anything “appalls” her. Yet, she feels that she has been wrongly condemned and denied pleasure. As Sara Ahmed (2004, 107) notes, there is shame involved in sexuality that is non-normative and norm-breaking. Society strictly controls who and what kind of bodies we can love and desire, and shame is a result of a “failure” in following social norms and narratives—for example the norm of heterosexual love. To desire something that one should reject has an enormous psychological and social toll: it can result in experiences of shame, self-hate, disgust, deep sorrow and melancholy (ibid., 197; 146). As the narrator continues: “This inclination toward women, does it really exist, or have I imagined it? I don’t know. It horrified and disgusted me, raised and infinite sorrow in me. So, I went to meet Master S. You must understand?”126 Her solution is to go and meet a man she has met while the lover is away in order to get rid of her “unnatural” feelings. However, she cannot go through with the plan and thus “fails” in her attempts to follow the heterosexual narrative. This is extremely rebellious, but also a source of suffering and pain.

As we have seen, the narrator constantly labels her experiences as “mad”: they arouse feelings of horror and disgust in her. Yet, the meanings of words like “natural” and “unnatural” are also constantly renegotiated: the narrator finds pleasure in the things that are marked as “shameful,” “disgusting,” “filthy” or “wrong”; there is enjoyment in the narrator’s fantasies and hallucinations which are labeled as pathological in the eyes of the society. In her talk about women and devils, the narrator shows that desire can be directed at something that is rejected and repressed in society: there is attraction and pleasure in the experiences of disgust and repulsion. This is also tied to the motif of “immorality”: the narrator identifies with devils and other “bad” characters and describes how this identification brings her pleasure: “The devils I can easily switch to angels. But, I must confess, I don’t like their company very much.”

126 “35. Tämä taipumuseni naisiin, onko se todella olemassa vai olenko sen kuvitellut, en tiedä. Se hirvitti ja inhotti minua, herätti minussa rajattoman surumielisyttä. Menin siis tapaamaan maisteri Sää. Ymmärrättehän?” (KS 39.)

The way the meanings of what is “natural” or “unnatural” change becomes especially apparent in the passage where she is most explicit about her desire for women—and the only description of homosexual desire which is not a fantasy or a dream but an actual event from the narrator’s past:

68. I recall one event from when I was fifteen years old. Or not actually an event, more like a mood. We were collecting plants with a school friend and we stopped at a meadow. It was luxuriant and green, there were thick tussocks of hay and reeds and willows growing in the trench, gray, leafy willows. At that moment, a sudden sensation of thrill and kindness came over me. I thought about the birds in the forests, on the branches, the bright, gray feathers and the smell of sweat and down on a small body, the bellflowers and wild turnips that were swaying cheerfully, erratically and fast in the wind, about the vibrant, nearly red air. My friend felt unspeakably dear to me. I tried to remember if I had done anything wrong to her so that I could now correct it. When I remembered that there was nothing, I kissed her with fondness, with joy and freshness. But the next day she avoided me, she avoided me until we left school. She didn’t respond when I spoke and avoided looking me in the eyes. She strangely avoided my touch, avoided giving me her hand... She thought that there was something shameful in my kiss, although there was nothing but the delight of the green meadow and the fact that I had not done anything wrong to her.

68. Muistelen erästä tapahtumaa viidenneltätoista ikävuodeltani, tai oike-astaan en mitään tapahtumaa, vaan erästä tunnelmaa. Olimme erään kou-lutoverini kanssa kasveja keräämässä. Pysähdyimme erääle niitylle. Se oli rehevän viheriä, heinää oli paksulti aivan kuin mättäittäin, ojissa kasvoi kaislava ja pajuja, harmahtavia, lehteviä pajuja. Silloin minut valtasi aikilli-nen ihastuksen ja hyvyyden tunne. Ajattelin lintuja metsissä, oksilla, niiden kirkkaita, harmaita sulkiä ja pienen ruumiin untuvan ja hien hajua, kellokukkia ja peltokaalia, jotka heilahtelivat iloisesti, nopeasti ja säännötömästi tuulessa, värähtelevästä, ikään kuin punertavaa ilmaa. Toverini tun-tui minusta sanomattoman rakkaita, koetin muistella olinko tehnyt hänelle mitään vääryyttä voidakseni sen nyt heti korjata. Kun muistin, ettei mitään sellaista ollut, suutelin häntä ihastuneena, riemukkaasti ja raikkaasti. Mutta seuraavana päivänä hän karttoi minua, karttoi aina siihen asti, kunnes erosimme koulusta. Hän ei vastannut puheisiin eikä katsonut miellessään silmiä. Karttoi oudosti kosketusta, antamasta kättä... Hän ajateli suudelmassani olleen jotain häpeällistä eikä siinä kuitenkaan ollut muuta kuin ihastusta niityn vihreystä ja siitä, etten ollut hänelle mitään vääryyttä tehnyt. (KS 71.)

127 “Piruthan voin aivan kepeästi vaihtaa enkeleihin. Mutta, tunnustan sen suoraan, tämä seura ei minua yhtä paljon miellytä.” (KS 31.)
Chapter 2: A Mind in a World

The desire is portrayed here as perfectly “natural,” akin to aesthetic pleasure and feelings of being in harmony with the world and with other people (see also Stang 2015, 234). Yet, the passage again brings forth feelings of shame—the narrator noticed that the other girl was ashamed—but this time she herself knows that there is nothing to be ashamed of. Love and sensuality are tied to feelings of pleasure that arise from nature—something that is typical also in Hämäläinen’s poetry (see Kähkönen 2002). The “beautiful soul” of Kaunis sielu gets a meaning of enchantment of nature, beauty and goodness—which are also connected to a new meaning, that of same-sex desire.

Since the narrator cannot enact her experiences in real life (the psychic toll would be too high), she turns to her imagination—looking at paintings, fantasizing—and goes through experiences of pleasure and joy, which are partly disturbing, yet exhilarating:

69. Even though I lie here waiting for death, my sensuality will not leave me. Though I think that I have gotten rid of my love for women. I am disturbed by different kinds of images. Or they don’t actually disturb me. I feel pleasure, idiotic pleasure while watching my images.

There is a goat walking in a very mild weather up the slope of a mountain. Small broad-leaved thistles spread their rosettes to the holes in the rocks, some sand is falling down in places. The goat has a long, shiny, fair hair, it turns its head every now and then. Every now and then it turns its head, it has a feminine, compassionate, sort of worried and stupid face. Its eyes are gentle and fair, the neck stretches, long, there is something immobile and obedient.

My eyes shining, I look at the goat, I would like to give it female breasts, covered by long, blond hair.

My God, My God, what lewdness is tearing at my brains still; a pleasurable, inventive, unnatural lewdness.

Hyvin lauhassa ilmassa astuskelee vuohi ylös vuoren rinnettä. Pienet leveälehtiset ohdakkeet levittävät ruusukkeensa kallion koloihin, paikoin valuu alas soraa. Vuohella on pitkä, kiiltävä, vaalea karva, se kääntää päätänsä vähän väliä. Vähän väliä se kääntää päätänsä, sillä on naisellinen, laupias, ikään kuin huolestunut ja tyhmä naama. Sen silmät ovat miedot ja vaaleat, kaula venyvä, pitkä, siinä on jotain liikkumaton ja totelevaista.

Silmät kiiluen katselen vuolta, minä sovittaisin sille mielelläni naisen rinnat, pitkien vaaleitten karvojen peittämät.

Herra Jumala, Herra Jumala, mikä riettaus repii yhä aivojani, nautinnokas, kekseliäs, luonnoston riettaus. (KS 72.)
There is immense pleasure in imagining, in the desire, and in the image of a goat-woman which is at the same time grotesque and enjoyable. Again, however, we can notice the ambivalence: the narrator first denies the “love for women,” yet immediately starts to imagine breasts. Something that is disgusting is once again also pleasurable, just like the devils, as she notes moments later: “In church the devils are naked, like animals, because devils are indecent, disgusting, filthy. But what if they arouse sensuality, fierce passion in a person, as in me?”

In these passages, the narrator is even more defiant than before: she explicitly says that the devils raise experiences of sensuality and passion in her. As Ahmed notes, expressing pleasures that are marked as wrong, as illegitimate or immoral can function as a form of political resistance: pleasure allows bodies to take up more space, and making the pleasure public can function as a declaration: “We are here!” (Ahmed 2004, 164). In sexuality that follows the norms, only certain kinds of bodies have the “right” for pleasure. But in reality, pleasure is not a “reward” for a “right” or “natural” (for example reproductive) sexual activity. As the narrator of Kaunis sielu shows, although experiences of pleasure are often controlled and shaped by society, they are also utterly subjective: the individual experience of sexuality and pleasure does not follow any norms or scripts. Representing different kinds of pleasures has a political power and significance: portraying norm-breaking pleasures and enjoyment can invade or open up new spaces—for example in literature (see also Ahmed 2004, 165).

It is also worth noting that the narrator’s thoughts about women are often connected to art: she imagines women she has seen in paintings and sculptures (see also Stang 2015, 235). In some occasions the “artistry” of the depiction of the narrator’s “love for women” is so exaggerated that it becomes almost ironic: “I have drunk. It is stupid. Intoxication, I thought it would be a good joke, elevated, spiritual. It is rubbish, everything. The only real intoxication is the one we drink from white limbs, from slender feet, tiny feet. Greater, more fulfilling intoxication I have felt only in the company of Pushkin and Goethe. Intoxication: a light state, where we can feel that we are beautiful, deeply beautiful, where we can talk about thoughts that are otherwise hidden.” (“Olen juonut. Typerää se on. Humala, luulin sitä hyväksi pilaksi, korkeaksi, henkiseksi. Roskaa se on koko juttu. Ainoa oikea humala on se, jonka me juomme valkeista jäsenistä, sirosta jalasta, pikkujalasta. Suurempaa, täydempää humalaa olen tuntenut Pushkinin ja Goethen seurassa. Humala: kevyt tila, jossa voimme tuntea itsemme kauniiksi, syvästi kauniiksi, jossa voimme puhua ajatuksia, jotka muuten ovat salassa.”) (KS 32.) “White limbs” and “slender feet” of women are connected to her aesthetic experiences. The narrator seems to place herself in the position of male artists: she enacts a male gaze on a female, objectified body. This is made explicit in the scene where she meets a sculptor friend who tells her “many very interesting stories about women” (“Hän kertoi useita hyvin mielenkiintoisia naisjuttuja.” KS 30). The scene with the sculptor is also the first hint about the narrator’s interest in women.
In her interviews and memoir, Hämäläinen repeatedly claimed that she wrote the passages about sexuality “instinctively,” not knowing that homosexuality even exists—although the descriptions are so explicit that it is difficult to believe her claim (see also Stang 2015, 227). As we saw in Chapter 1, the representations of same-sex desire, although they are framed as “illness” in the novel, were apparently received with shock at the time of writing. Yet from the perspective of a twenty-first-century reader, it is easy to connect the labeling of the pleasures and desires as an “illness” to the repressive social norms of the time. The experiences of shame, self-hate and alienation from the world that are caused by the oppressive norms, as well as the desires and pleasures that the narrator goes through, are more likely to be understood and empathized with today than they were when Hämäläinen wrote the novel and offered it for publication. Today, it is possible to see the novel as a revolt against oppressive cultural norms, scripts, and narratives.

Against Oppressive Narratives

In the final chapter, the narrator returns to the story which was fragmentarily started in Chapter I, about getting to know the man and beginning the affair with him. She tries once more to organize the different reasons why she wanted to kill him, and here she gives the most coherent account of the events that led to the murder. However, it becomes once again clear that her experiences defy a coherent narrative form and efforts to narrate. She recounts meeting the man and mentions that although she had no knowledge of her “love for women” at the time, “a strange lack of joy, lack of passion came over me immediately when we embraced. It felt as if all the joyous sensuality had in that moment gone dim, poor.” She thus offers a retelling of her earlier story, more self-consciously than in the first chapter, now aware of and open about her sexual desire for women and explicitly saying that the man brought her no pleasure, in body or mind: “This man did not satisfy me intellectually, I think. He was insignificant, unimportant, his thoughts were trivial. I knew all this from the start.” She also mentions her efforts to fall in love with the other man (“Master S.”) and says that it was then that she finally understood her sexual orientation: “Then I for the first time notice my inclination toward women, and this is why I almost 130 See 1.4. Both Kivilaakso (2012) and Stang (2015, 227–229) also note Hämäläinen’s conflicting statements about Kaunis sielu (how she came to write about homosexuality; whether the manuscript was lost or not) and interpret them as signs of the silences and repression surrounding homosexuality in the Finnish culture.

---

105

131 “Minulla ei tällöin vielä ollut aavistustakaan rakkaudestani naisiin, mutta omituinen ilottumuus, kiihkottomuus valtasi minut heti syleillessämme. Tuntui kuin kaikki riemukas aistillisuus olisi sinä hetkenä himmentynyt, käynyt köyhäksi.” (KS 114.)

offer myself to the man, but suddenly, inexplicably, I cannot do it.” 133 What was in the first account only hinted at is now made explicit.

In addition to the reflections about sexual feelings, she provides some completely new information, which is, however, in contradiction with her statements about the lover’s “insignificance.” She tells us that the man behaved “coldly and politely, even indifferently” to her when they met in public and says that this made her feel insulted and humiliated: “That was when for the first time I thought about revenge—filled with pride and furious with rage—and I felt myself reduced.” 134 After describing these quite understandable reactions to an experience of being snubbed, she goes on to recount how the man started to disgust her and became repulsive in her eyes: he drank alcohol and read “trashy literature” about “murders and crimes” (KS 116). One of the stories the man read was about a murderer who kills women, and the narrator recounts how she started to think that perhaps the man had also planned to kill her: “To get rid of a body that had become dear to him, to murder because of fervent jealousy and also to be released of the passion. […] Actually, he had very similar thoughts as I did.” 135 For several pages she tries to offer evidence for the idea that the man had the same plans as her, speculating once again about the man’s thoughts and experiences, convincing herself that he felt the same as her. The borders between the man and herself seem to be disappearing in the narrator’s mind.

Finally, she returns to the moment of the murder: she describes the man as “vulgar” and “repulsive,” he is “controlled by lust” (KS 119–120). She repeats her story of killing him in a bout of shame and disgust, and ends her reiteration by saying that even her explanation “disgusts” her:

93. […] My long explanation disgusts me. Let everything be a mosaic, patterns, futile squares and circles. Does it concern me? I will die soon, take everything with me, and make a pile out of these gaudy colors and unfit pieces. See, I could not arrange them, I say. Pile of bricks.

This second account of the murder and its reasons is more coherent than the first one: it is narrated in retrospect as one single narrative, not piece by piece

---

133 “Sitten huomaan ensi kerran mieltymyksetni naisiin ja sen vuoksi olen miltei antautumaisillani miehelle, kun odottamatta, käsitämättömästi, en siihen pystykään.” (KS 118–119.)
134 “Silloin ensi kerran ajattelin kostoa – ylpeydestä ja raivosta kuohon – ja tunsin itseni alentuneeksi.” (KS 116.)
135 “Hävitää ruumiin, joka oli tullut hänelle kalliiksi, murhata kiihkoisasta mustasukkaisuudesta ja osaksi myöskin vapautuakseen intohimostaan. […] Hänhän oli siten oikeastaan hyvin samanlaisissa ajatuksissa kuin minä.” (KS 117.)
as before. The process of trying to tell the story and the narrator’s reflections seem to have offered her new self-understanding and new ways to connect the pieces of the past. However, also this recount ends with a description of the failure to find any exact meaning for the murder and her experiences. Even the narrator’s “final” interpretation of the events is in the end just as conflicted as any other, and she states this explicitly:

105. [...] The reason, the ultimate reason, was perhaps the mosaic, blue and gray pieces, the heterogeneity of the mind, the scatteredness and numbness. On the one hand sensitivity, on the other numbness. Contradictions. I have never felt anything seriously, truly, everything has been vague to me, and I have embellished everything. Also, the gloom and the fury. I have felt pity and being sorry, but in general there has been no love or goodness in me. God has made a mistake in me, an unnatural thing.

In the end, readers are offered multiple different “explanations” for the narrator’s experiences. There is the simple narrative of being rejected by one’s lover and the shame of being “deplored” and “condemned” by others: “Because of hate and pride, but also because of great, hopeless sorrow I murdered him. Because I was hopelessly sad that he allowed people to turn up their noses.” 136 Then there is the story about the murder as a kind of a self-defense against the man’s murderous plans. But most importantly, the efforts to recount the story about the relationship with the man reveal another kind of narrative, about forbidden and suppressed desires. There is suffering in the fragmentariness and inability to “arrange” one’s story, but the narrator also creates a praise of the fragmentary, the messy and contradictory which reveals experiences that are concealed by normative narratives and scripts.

The end of the novel is even more fragmentary than before and filled with different kinds of aesthetic experiences and feelings of guilt, shame, pleasure, and wonder. The narrator wanders around Helsinki. She tells us that she wants to see the places she loves for the last time (a tree, a harbor, the park) and bargains with God to give her a few more days. The written diary form is now left completely behind and both the story and the narration start to break with the logic of reality as well as with the mimetic code (what is plausible to do in a mimetic narration and story). The narrator recounts things at the same time as she walks—and crawls—around Helsinki. Her health is deteriorating, she has a fever and her body is giving up, but not in any regular way. She recounts that her breath is “coming out of her ears,” her hands are “two horrible, sticking bones” (KS 132), it is difficult for her to move, and yet she is amazed at her bodily decay:

136 “Vihasta ja ylpeydestä, mutta myöskin suuresta, toivottomasta surusta hänet murhasin. Sillä toivottoman surullinen minä olin siksi, että hän salli nämä nenän nyrpistelyt.” (KS 109.)

102. [...] I cannot get up, I cannot. I roll myself into the pit by the street, my body fits there perfectly, but I have to move on. I try to get up. It is impossible. I start to crawl. The hands become hot, a nasty, blue shining bone is exposed from the knees, there is blood coming in drips. I am amazed that there is still some left. I look at it with wonder.

She ultimately reaches home, loses consciousness and when she wakes up, she continues to imagine (or hallucinate) moving around Helsinki. The bodily experiences are even more exaggerated:

103. [...] I clench my teeth, the veins in my neck are throbbing, the heart is compressing, I feel how the veins are bulging, they are drained, there is no more blood left in me. How could there be, I have thrown up puddles of it in the bucket.

103. [...] Kiristelen hampaitani, kaulasuonet tykyttävät hurjasti, sydän puristuu kokoon, tunnen kuinka suonet pullistuvat, imevät tyhjää, minussa ei ole enää verta. Mistä sitä olisikaan, minähän olen oksennellut sitä lammi-koitain ämpäriin. (KS 140.)

The borders between hallucination and reality become completely hazy and the narration constructs a hallucinatory world that is divorced from the actual one.137 Readers are invited to join the narrator in imagining her fantastic, hallucinatory thoughts and her degenerating body. Rather than interpretation, the narration invites affective responses. Finally, however, the narrator asks her readers to “arrange her pieces” (KS 142). She addresses us for the last time, creates her final imaginings (a red flower and a crawling bug) and then turns to God: “Loss of consciousness. Mistake. Blue, yellow triangles. The night is here. Dark. No, not yet. Your final ruthlessness.”138 On the final page, she imagines

---

137 The storyworld and the narration start to resemble Kafka’s early hallucinatory short story “The Description of the Struggle” (1912) in which the narrator goes through strange bodily transformations and experiences of solipsistic control of the world (see also Sass 1994, 317–323).

the face of Christ, which first comes in the form of an animal, bringing with it a smell of birches and a sensation of beauty and tranquility.

The novel ends with an affective image which brings together the iconography of altar paintings (“the face of Christ,” “a cloak”), experiences of disgust (“pallid,” “filthy”) and a sense of pleasure deriving from Christ covering her with his cloak and smelling the clean air and the birch leaves:

106. [...] You look at us with your glorious, pallid face, you throw your cloak on our naked, filthy limbs. Blue birch leaves and clean, wonderful air close to your head.

106. [...] Katsot meitä ihanin, kelmein kasvoin, heität viittasi alastomille, saastaisille jäsenilleemme. Siniset koivunlehdet ja puhdas, ihana ilma likellä pääläsi. (KS 144.)

Yet, although the final paragraph evokes religious images and images of natural beauty, it is not without contradictions and fissures: there are the negative adjectives and the imagery is once again exaggerated and artistic, breaking away from mimetic description. The Christ is as if stepping down from a painting, his face “pallid” like in an altar painting, covering the “filthy” limbs of the narrator (and other humans) with his cloak. With him comes the image of the blue birch leaves and the brush of “clean, wonderful air.” The aesthetic and affective are yet again intertwined. However, from today’s perspective, the ending of Kaunis sielu is also interesting and strange considering the composition of the whole text: the religious imagery is in contradiction with everything that is said before and it appears that it is forced on the text. There seems to have been a demand for a narrative closure in which the rebellious, norm-breaking female character makes her peace with God and then dies. Kaunis sielu challenges many normative and oppressive narratives through its fragmentariness, affectivity and representations of forbidden desires, but ultimately also conforms to them.

2.4. Affective, Aesthetic, and Political Transgressions

[Forms are everywhere structuring and patterning experience [...].] (Levine 2015, 16.)

As we have seen, the experiences of unsettlement, distress and suffering the narrator goes through are all filled with affective and aesthetic meaning. Her experiential world is not meaningless, incomprehensible or unintelligible, although she insists that she cannot make sense of herself and labels her experiences and actions as “mad,” “unnatural” and “condemnable.” The experiences can be understood in the context of the possibilities the world affords and the social restrictions and norms that cause her suffering, as well as in the context of imagination, art, and aesthetics. I have also sought to show that the experiences are not just distressing or negative: there are also moments of joy and pleasure, albeit brief and imaginary or hallucinatory. Moreover, although the narrator’s experiential world is in many ways solipsistic and closed, her experiences are also intersubjective and interaffective: the mind constructed in Kaunis sielu is relational, affected by and affecting the world and other people. Even though the borders between the self and the world are hazy and the narrator feels that she is losing control of herself, she maintains her narrative agency throughout the text. To conclude this chapter, let us look more closely at the kind of transgression Kaunis sielu creates and enacts.

Throughout the novel, a tension is created between the notion of the aesthetic and harmonious “beautiful soul” and the narrator’s violent thoughts, obsessions and fantasies. As an early twentieth century text, Kaunis sielu enacts the growing understanding of the subject as internally conflicted. It moves away from the ideal of the “beautiful soul,” toward a (psychoanalytical) understanding of the subject as controlled by the unconscious and the restrictions and prohibitions imposed by society and its norms. In this context, the narrator’s experiences of shattering and distress (what she labels as “madness”) can be seen both as a symptom of an oppressive social system and as a form of rebellion against it. “The madness” of the narrator is caused by oppressive norms and the narrator’s failures to follow them, and yet, at the same time, it is an attack against these norms, manifested in the affective discourse of the narrator, and in her dreams and fantasies which go against the social norms and moral codes. “All the laws are incomprehensible to me,” she claims at the end of her story.

The transgression of oppressive social norms and cultural narratives is thematized in several ways in Kaunis sielu. It appears in the theme of adultery and in the narrator’s dismissal of marriage. Adultery became a common motif in Finnish literature in the late nineteenth century, following international trends, and especially 1930s literature is filled with female protagonists breaking their marriage vows. The popularity of the theme is often linked to the growing

---

139 As mentioned in 1.4, “the beautiful soul” (die schöne Seele) is a soul that has found harmony between reason and emotions, duty and inclination. It was especially discussed by Friedrich Schiller, who was an important influence for Hämäläinen and whose poems are explicitly mentioned in Kaunis sielu (see KS 68; see also Haavikko & Hämäläinen 1993, 83; 496). According to Schiller, beauty enables the person to become a whole, harmonious being: aesthetic education bridges the gap between nature and reason and frees the subject from the burden of “sensual inclinations.” In this respect, beauty is linked to goodness and to mental health, and it has a power to resolve the interior conflicts of a human being. (See Norton 1995.)

140 “Kaikki lait ovat minulle käsittämättömät.” (KS 140.)

141 E.g., Hämäläinen’s second published novel Lumoous (The Enchantment, 1934) resembles Kaunis sielu in its motifs of adultery and female sexual desire, but both the narration and the need to discuss female sexuality and the social efforts to control and repress it (see Juutila 1999, 370). In Kaunis sielu, the narrator offers a view which is to some extent radical even today: that marriage cannot tie people together and stop them from fulfilling their passions (see also Stang 2015, 238). As she states:
Chapter 2: A Mind in a World

93. I did not see the adultery as significant in any way; I did not shun it at all. Firstly, because I think that a human being can never be tied to another in such a way that the other person could stop her [from doing something], or that an emotion for another—pity, respect—could ever, except in some rare cases, be an obstacle if she wanted to fulfill a powerful passion.

She rejects the Christian and conservative norms behind the idea of marriage as a sacred bond. The revolt is then made concrete through the murder she commits or imagines/hallucinates: she violates the moral norms of society in an extreme way, and the murder can be read as an attack against the whole society. As she claims: “a desire for revolt arose in me.”\(^{142}\) However, the motif of a female murderer or a femme fatale who kills her husband or lover to break away from a repressive relationship was not in any way new or radical in Finnish literature at the time: for example, author and women’s rights activist Minna Canth had repeatedly used it in her works in the late nineteenth century. Ultimately the strongest expression of social transgression in Kaunis sielu is the description of the homosexual desire, which was at the time viewed as a pathological condition.\(^{143}\) The narrator, too, pathologizes herself, but nonetheless constantly returns to express her desires, and is even defiant. She claims that the man was

\(^{142}\) “[M]inussa heräsi kapinahalu.” (KS 115.)

\(^{143}\) Attitudes to homosexuality in the 1920s and 1930s literature and literary circles in Finland were twofold. On the one hand, homosexual desire was linked to illness and degeneration (in, e.g., Elsa Soini’s, Riku Sarkola’s and Martti Merenmaa’s novels which portrayed homosexual characters). On the other, literary society in Helsinki at the time was relatively open to (male) homosexuality. (See, e.g., Hapuli 1995; Koskela 1999; Tihinen 2007; Stang 2015.) E.g., Olavi Paavolainen (Hämäläinen’s partner later in the 1930s) explicitly criticized the negative representation of homosexuality in literature in his essay collection Suurssivous (The Clean Down, 1932). He was openly bisexual and known for crossing gender and sexual boundaries, and “insignificant,” both bodily and intellectually, and turns to her fantasies about women, devils, and nature to find both sexual and aesthetic pleasure.

Kaunis sielu is an ambivalent work at its core. It makes questionable the “beauty” and “harmony” of the “beautiful soul” and constantly labels the narrator’s experiences as “madness,” connecting “madness” to “immorality” and “unnaturality”: to the murder, to the narrator’s “low” and “criminal” nature and to her “appalling” desires, risking the creation of problematic metaphors for mental illness. The transgressions the narrator enacts are confronted with efforts to repress and stigmatize. The narrator does this herself, embodying the social norms and narratives, constructing a kind of double consciousness in which she is looking at herself through the eyes of the heteronormative and patriarchal society, judging herself. This leads to enormous suffering: experiences of shattering, pain, and distress. In the end, the narrator dies, following a narrative form that is common from many other stories about women who dare to rebel against sexual norms.

The political and aesthetic meaning of the representation of affects, emotions and desires in Kaunis sielu cannot, however, be reduced to the closed ending. The efforts to portray illness and shattering also make possible the representation of non-normative desires and queer affects. Despite the conventional ending and the pathologizing of the narrator’s experiences, Kaunis sielu manages to give voice to ambivalence, heterogeneity, and multiplicity of desires. Hämaäläinen’s experimental narration searches for ways to represent bodily sensations, affects, and emotions, and the representation also reveals how social norms and structures shape subjects. Further, besides the pain and distress, the narration enacts feelings of pleasure and wonder. The representation of affects, emotions, and desires transgresses oppressive social norms, and challenges normative ways of understanding subjectivity and the subject’s relationship to the world and others. It creates opportunities for new meanings and new ways of being.

Hämaäläinen actually based her descriptions of homosexuality in her later novel, Säädyllinen murhenäytelmä, on Paavolainen (see Tihinen 2007, 131–136). However, when Säädyllinen murhenäytelmä was published in 1941, attitudes to homosexuality had become more repressive and the passages depicting sex and homosexual experiences were censored. The full, uncensored manuscript was not published until 1995. On the cultural atmosphere regarding homosexuality in Finland and the publication (and censorship) of queer topics in literature, see Juvonen 2007; Stang 2015.

144 American sociologist W. E. B. Du Bois first used the term “double consciousness” in his autoethnographic work The Souls of Black Folk (1903) to describe the experience of looking at oneself through the eyes of white people in a racist society: “It is a peculiar sensation, this double-consciousness, this sense of always looking at one’s self through the eyes of others, of measuring one’s soul by the tape of a world that looks on in amused contempt and pity. One ever feels his two-ness,—an American, a Negro; two souls, two thoughts, two unreconciled strivings; two warring ideals in one dark body, whose dogged strength alone keeps it from being torn asunder.” (Du Bois 2007, 38.)
CHAPTER 3

A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation: Madness, Metafiction, and Ethics in Tohtori Finckelman

Everything is so sad. It is as if joy had died.
Well, after all that—it’s a miracle that I am still alive!
And yet, I am glad—well, sort of. And at the same time sad, very sad. Sad because my thoughts are chasing the past unrelentingly like wild dogs. Glad, because I am alive and holding a pen in my hands again. Am I holding a pen? I ask myself quietly. Is it really me? Am I the person hanging at the end of the pen? I ask. It is me, it is me, I reply to myself pleased and try to be a carefree man.

But no, no, no… They are singing a hymn by the grave of joy, I can hear it well.

On niin surullista kaikki. On kuin ilo olisi kuollut.
No kaiken sen jälkeen – ihme että elän!

Mutta ei, ei, ei... Ilon haudalla veisataan, minä kuulen sen kyllä. (TF 3.)

In the preface to Jorma Korpela’s Tohtori Finckelman (Doctor Finckelman, 1952), the narrator-protagonist is getting ready to write down the story of his life after a severe mental breakdown (as readers learn later). He reports his shifting emotions and moods and creates suspense: “after all that—it’s a miracle that I am still alive!” The story, however, is full of contradictions right from the start: the narrative discourse works like a roller-coaster, going up and down, moving from the narrator’s declarations about his thoughts and feelings straight into denying them. There is a structure of yes-and-no—or of proposition-negation, as Sari Salin (2002, 42) has aptly named the technique—in which the narrator first makes a statement and then immediately casts a doubt on it: “Everything is so sad […] And yet, I am glad—well, sort of”; “I am alive and holding a pen […] Am I holding a pen?”; “Is it really me? […] It is me, it is me.”
The reading experience of Tohtori Finckelman is also affected by this yes-and-no structure: we are taken up and down, drawn close and pushed back. There are at least two ways the structure could affect the readers’ understanding of the narrator-protagonist. We could start to follow his changing moods and patterns of thought: to empathize with the sadness and joy he writes about and with the uncertainty about his actions (is he holding a pen?) and even about his existence (is it really him?). Or, we might begin to doubt his sincerity, grasp the ironic tone of the text and even start to read it as a mockery of an affective, experiential discourse and ultimately as a parody of how to begin a memoir—as a kind of a mock-memoir. In what follows, I propose that the text invites its readers to do both: to feel with the narrator and to distance themselves from him. More precisely, this chapter focuses on the oscillation between psychological lifelikeness and metafictional play, affectivity and artificiality, and empathy and estrangement that characterize the narrative strategies employed in the text, as well as the reading experience resulting from these strategies.\(^\text{145}\)

The back-and-forth-movement that is constructed in the preface is closely connected with the main themes of the novel—alienation from the intersubjective world, dividedness or plurality of selfhood, guilt and reconciliation—and it foreshadows everything that will be told later. When we read the text further, we learn that the narrator-protagonist is a divided figure in several respects. On one level, he is literally divided into two people: we learn that the title of the novel, Tohtori Finckelman, refers to an imaginary, evil doctor who abuses women and murders people. The character of “Dr. Finckelman” is invented by the narrator-protagonist himself as a young man together with Riitu, an old man who tells the protagonist half-real, half-fictional stories about thieves and murderers. Later, working as a psychiatrist, the protagonist (who, like the narrator of Kaunis sielu, remains nameless throughout the novel) constantly returns to Riitu’s stories, supplements them and starts to identify with the imaginary doctor who is, as the readers will notice, also a highly intertextual character referring to a long history of “mad” scientists (see also Salin 2002, 99–100). As the story goes on, the protagonist gradually loses his own identity and “becomes” Dr. Finckelman—hence the doubts in the preface whether he “really is him(self).”\(^\text{146}\)

On a more symbolic level, the narrator enacts the basic tragedy of a speaking, social subject: when we try to put into words the stories of our lives, we are forced to look at ourselves from the outside. A gap appears between the experiences and the words describing them. This dividedness also characterizes the narrative situation of the novel. As the narrator—the person “hanging at the end of the pen”—recounts the story of his life, a distance emerges between his present and past self, as in every autobiography and in all self-narration (see Cohn 1978, 143; Phelan 2005). This existential dividedness is often a source of suffering (how can one put one’s feelings into words?), but it also enables a reflective relationship with oneself: both self-awareness and ironic distance to oneself. The narrative structure of Tohtori Finckelman, in other words, reflects the condition of a human being who tries to tell their story, who looks at themselves from the outside, and who is thus split in two.

---

\(^{145}\) E.g., Annamari Sarajas (1953/1980, 75) has described the reading experience of Tohtori Finckelman as “wobbly.” For her, this “sense of wobbliness” (“vaappuvuuden tuntu”) is a result of the movement between what she calls the “realist” and the “sur-realist” \(^{\text{sic}}\) levels of the text.

\(^{146}\) Matti Vainio (1975, 93) notes that the title of the novel was originally “The Story of a Miserable Man” (“Ihmiskurjan kertomus”). The publisher however suggested the name “Dr. Finckelman” and “The Miserable Man” became the subtitle. The two titles thus also reflect the dividedness of the narrator-protagonist.

The dividedness at the core of the novel means that readers have several interpretative paths through the narrator-protagonist’s mind and the story he tells. On the one hand, we can read him psychologically: we can diagnose him as a schizoid or dissociated personality who suffers from a severe mental illness and whose delusions, hallucinations, or dissociations are developed around the fictional character of Dr. Finckelman. We can thus naturalize the “strange” in the novel as a form of psychiatric disorder. On the other hand, we can read the narrator-protagonist as a metafictional character through which the author, Korpela, explores the borders of fiction and reality, imagination, hallucination, and perception, as well as fictional and actual minds. The novel thus brings together a sense of psychological lifelikeness and an understanding of the constructedness of fictional minds: it creates a cognitively and affectively evocative portrayal of experiences of distress and suffering, and ultimately of loss of borders between reality and imagination, but it also continuously casts doubt on the human-likeness of the narrator-protagonist by suggesting (and reminding the readers) that he is actually a fictional character, an artificial being.

In what follows, I suggest that although these interpretative paths (“psychological” and “metafictional,” “human” and “non-human,” “affective” and “artificial”) are at first sight mutually exclusive, Korpela invites readers to constantly oscillate between them. The sense of lifelikeness that is evoked in the text is tightly intertwined with the artistic and intertextual elements and the metafictional schemes. As Patricia Waugh (1984, 104) writes: “Metafictional novels allow the reader not only to observe the textual and linguistic construction of literary fiction, but also to enjoy and engage with the world within the fiction.” However, what makes the reader position offered by Tohtori Finckelman more complicated is that the psychological and metafictional frames of reading do not seem to be enough to give justice to the whole novel: a crime happens in the story and it demands readers to take an ethical stance. A woman, the narrator-protagonist’s patient, is raped, and the readers have good reasons to suspect that he is the rapist. Close to the end of the novel, the protagonist is acquitted of the charges: he paints the testimony of the victim as a “fantasy” and another man, a former soldier and an alcoholic poet called Saleva, is convicted and locked inside the mental hospital of which the protagonist is in charge. In the end, the text leaves a lot of questions hanging in the air: Is the narrator-protagonist guilty or innocent? Is he lying, or is he suffering from hallucinations or dissociation? Where are the borders between the protagonist and the other characters? Who or what, in fact, is Dr. Finckelman?149 On the one hand, the narrator is a psychologically convincing character suffering from severe mental illness; on the other, the novel constructs a non-human, ontologically impossible mind.

147 As Vainio (1975, 100) writes in his analysis of Tohtori Finckelman, there is a “double vision”: “everything is seen through a strange veil of duality, ambivalence” (“kaikki [...] nähdään tuon kummallisen kaksinaisuuden verhon, ambivalenssin läpi”). Or as Salin (2002, 22) puts it: “everything has two sides, two possibilities for interpretation” (“Kaikessa on kaksi puolta, kaksi tulkintavaihtoehtoa”).

148 E.g., Kare 1952/1996, 360; Erho 1971, 35; Vainio 1975, 169; and Laitinen 1997, 461 describe the narrator’s experiences as “depersonalization.” However, especially Sarajas (1953/1980, 59–60; 75–76) but also Vainio and Laitinen, emphasize that in addition to their psychological meaning, the experiences have a thematic function. The dividedness of the protagonist embodies the Dostoyevskyan themes of faith and skepticism, compassion and cruelty, and good and evil.

Readers are invited to act as detectives (or as psychiatrists) whose task is to figure out the “truth” about the narrator-protagonist’s mind and his identity (this is in fact what the narrator says he himself is doing in his work as a psychiatrist). At the same time, the text also obstructs this psychologizing interpretive path and reminds readers of the fictionality of the minds constructed in the novel. In the end, neither the psychological nor the metafictional modes of reading seem sufficient for an ethically sustainable view of the text (see also Salin 2002, 220). In the psychological interpretation, the risk is that the crime is ignored (“the protagonist is suffering from mental illness”; “even if he is guilty, he is not responsible for the act”). The metafictional reading, in turn, makes the narrative a kind of a game or a play, and the questions about ethics and justice become irrelevant (“the protagonist is an artificial creature”; “the novel is an intertextual play”). In both readings, the violence of the crime is hidden from view, just as it is hidden in the text itself (the victim’s story is never heard, we only have the narrator’s perspective). In addition to the importance of acknowledging the violence at the core of the story, these themes point to the general problems of reading and interpreting other minds: the novel warns of the power relations and the potential violence in reading, labeling, and categorizing others.

In the following, I focus on the ambiguous situation in which readers are engaging with and even immersed in a storyworld which they know to be a creation of an unreliable narrator (perhaps a mentally distressed person, or a violent criminal and a fraud). Just as we are immersed in the unreality of fiction in general when we are reading (we know that fiction is fiction), we also maintain a similar dual position when facing unreliability and moral transgressions in fictional texts. As readers, we are very good at detecting when narrators lie to or deceive us, intentionally or not, and still we enjoy these deceptions (much unlike in real life). We also allow ourselves to empathize with characters whose actions in real life would be regarded as deeply unethical: when we read, we do not need to think about ethics or the moral norms of the society (see Booth 1983, 378; Keen 2007, 168; Leake 2014; Caracciolo 2016, 42). However, I argue that Tohtori Finckelman invites us to do so through its narrative structure, themes, and events. The analysis of such an ambiguous, empathy-inviting and distance-triggering text like Tohtori Finckelman is an effort to think about the unreliability, ambiguity, and undecidability that are typical in modernist literature from a phenomenological-enactivist perspective and bring it to conversation with a politically and ethically oriented reading.

149 The last one is a question one of the characters, Master Pomila, actually asks from the protagonist: “‘Who is Finckelman, by the way?’ he asked. ‘No one.’ ‘No one? He must be something.’” (“– Kuka muuten on Finckelman? hän kysäisi. – Ei kukaan. – Eikö? Kyllä hän jokin on.”) (TF 245, emphasis added.)

In the first section, I discuss how the borders of fact and fiction are shattered and distorted in Part One of the novel. This includes a rather detailed description of the main events and motifs of Part One, which becomes important later in the analysis. I then take a closer look at the experiences of distress and suffering which invite empathy for the narrator-protagonist and which connect him, on the one hand, to persons suffering from psychosis or dissociation (see Sass 1994), and on the other, to the literary tradition of abject heroes and fictional madmen (see Bernstein 1992). In the third section, I turn to the elements of misogyny and sexual violence in the novel, which, I claim, are meant to instruct readers to distance themselves from the narrator and move toward a more politically engaged reading. In the final sections, I focus on the climactic events at the core of the story and discuss how Tohtori Finckelman explores the relationship between the self and other—questions that have puzzled all the novel’s critics and academic readers.150

3.1. The Unreliable Narrator and the Blending of Fiction and Reality

And so I begin. I will write down the story of my life and I will do so as a warning to others, as an honest man does. I shall tell you my story without embellishing anything: exactly as everything happened in reality. In fact, if

---

I know myself, I shall tell many things even more accurately than what is real, just to show you how honest I am.

 [...]
But the words are hollow and flat, they lack the breath of life. And I don’t know how I could light up the words that have died out. I wish I could, I wish I could... I wish I could cut a piece of my flesh into every word! My story begins.

Ja niin minä alan, kirjoitan elämäni tarinan, teen sen varoitukseksi muille kuten rehellinen mies tekee. Tulen kertomaan kaiken kaunisellelta, tarkalleen niin kuin todellisuudessa tapahtunut on, kerronpa jos itseeni tunnen monet seikat todellisuutta tarkemminkin vain osoittaakseni, miten rehellinen olen.

 [...]
Mutta sanat ovat onttoja ja väljähtyneitä, niiltä puuttuu elämän henkäys; enkä tiedä, miten voisin puhuttaa sammuneet sanat liekkiin. Kunpa voisin, kunpa voisin... Kunpa voisin jokaiseen sanaan leikata palan lihaani! Kerto-mukseni alkaa. (TF 3–4.)

The preface sets up the narrative situation and creates a frame for the whole novel, and already the opening pages raise suspicions about the narrator’s reliability. The narrator’s promise to depict events truthfully—“exactly as everything happened in reality”—becomes ironic because of his hyperbolic claim to recount the events “even more accurately than what is real”; “just to show you how honest I am.” As Salin (1996, vii; 2002, 39–40) has pointed out, the constant contradictions, slips of the tongue, and ultimately the narrator-protagonist’s hallucinations (or dissociative experiences) guide readers to perceive him as an unreliable figure. However, a recurrent strategy in the narrator’s discourse is that right after saying something that forces the readers to doubt his words and to distance themselves from him, he says something else that again draws us close. This happens also in the above-quoted passage: soon after the narrator has “declared his unreliability” (Salin 1996, vii), the register changes: he brings up the “flatness” of his words and the lack of life that haunts them. He enacts the ever-present gap between words and experiences and reveals how it causes him suffering. His omnipotence as a narrator is constantly shadowed by the impotence of his words, and we are invited to empathize with his distress.

After the preface, the readers are thus left with two contradictory ways of evaluating the narrator’s story. On the one hand, we have learned that his words are not to be trusted; we know to suspect that he will modify the things he recounts to make the story “even more accurate than reality.” On the other hand, we see the narrator suffering from the gap between words and experiences. He is struggling to share his experience of breakdown and recovery as honestly as he can, but the words cannot convey what he feels. His metaphor of cutting his flesh into his words is grotesque and exaggerated, but at the same time full of affective meaning.\textsuperscript{151} We know to expect that the narrator will be unreliable, that he will embellish and alter the reality, but at the same time he vividly verbalizes experiences that are relatable to all speaking, social beings.\textsuperscript{152}

After thus framing his task, the narrator begins his story from when he was sixteen years old and his father has just died. The events are told mostly from the point of view of the experiencing I (i.e., the narrator as a young man): the discourse is in the past tense, but the narrator adopts the position of his past self. He recounts that his mother had passed away earlier and he has now inherited the family’s farm house. “I will fix my farm,”\textsuperscript{153} he depicts his young self boasting—and tells us especially about his friendship with an old man called Riitu, who is “considered to be insane”\textsuperscript{154} and who (as is revealed to us by the narrator’s farmhand Oskari on the final pages of the novel) has killed two people, a woman and a man. We are also introduced to Oskari, whom the narrator describes as his loyal servant and a simple, honest man. Furthermore, we get to know two vagabonds who appear at the farm one after another and, as we can guess from their actions, try to profit from the young man’s situation. Simpanen is an ex-convict who excels in distilling illegal liquor and Hoikkanein is introduced as a “gentleman” whom readers can recognize as a con artist. The first part of the novel is entitled “the Heritage”—referring to the inherited estate, but even more importantly to the stories Riitu tells and which start to affect the protagonist, ultimately creating a separate imaginary-hallucinatory world inside the storyworld (see also Havu 1952/1996, 356; Holappa 1952/1996, 358; Sarajas 1953/1980, 71; Salin 2002, 87; 209).

The Hazy Borders

To trace how the borders between what is real and what is not start to get confused in the novel, let us look at a key event in Part One: the invention of Dr. Finckelman in Chapter 4. Here the narrator recounts how Riitu told him a story about his old friend, “Emppu Lerkkanen,” who was “a good man, [he] killed

---

\textsuperscript{151} The notion of putting one’s flesh or blood into words is common in twentieth-century philosophy and thought. Jacques Derrida famously emphasized the impossibility of capturing through language what is outside it: “If I compare the pen to a syringe, and I always dream of a pen that would be a syringe, a suction point rather than that very hard weapon with which one must inscribe, incise, choose, calculate, take ink before filtering the inscribable, playing the keyboard on the screen, whereas here, once the right vein has been found, no more toil, no responsibility, no risk of bad taste nor of violence, the blood delivers itself alone, the inside gives itself up.” (Derrida 1993, 12.)

\textsuperscript{152} James Phelan (2007, 223–224) has called these two forms of unreliability “distancing” and “bonding”: the former increases the distance between the narrator and the audience while the latter diminishes it. I return to this oscillation between closeness and distance and empathy and estrangement triggered by the narrator’s unreliability in 3.2.

\textsuperscript{153} “Panentaloni kuntoon.” (TF 8; 12.)

\textsuperscript{154} “Häntä pidettiin hulluna.” (TF 7.)
many men....” Riitu’s talk reveals similar signs of unreliability to the narrator’s: Riitu constantly contradicts what he has just said, there are big gaps in his stories, and it is difficult to pinpoint where the borders of reality and fiction are in them. Similarly to the preface when the narrator proclaimed how “honestly” he was going to tell his story, Riitu has a strange notion of what it means to be “honest” or “good”:

In Riitu’s mind, categories like “honest” and “good” are turned upside down: “honest” is someone who steals, “good” is someone who “killed many men.” We can also notice how the story about Lerkkanen gradually turns into a story about “us,” and it becomes clear that Riitu, too, has been involved in the robberies and has actually been in prison with Lerkkanen. As the story evolves, it becomes increasingly uncertain what Riitu’s role in it is, how much of what he tells the protagonist is about “his friend” and how much about himself. The young protagonist guides and supports Riitu with his questions and comments:

– How about the market? How did it go there?
– It went well! Everybody praised Lerkkanen and said you don’t see a man like that often. And they sure weren’t just talking, Emppu was drunk as a skunk, he sang humorous songs at the market place and at the hotel and wherever he went, got everybody drunk, the whole crowd. And if he met a woman, he grabbed her and went on his way. And those who wouldn’t go voluntarily, he took by force. Yep, that was life!
– It sure was!
– Entäs markkinat? Mitenkäs siellä kävi?
– Hyvin kävi! Kaikki ylistivät Lerkkasta ja puhuivat, että sellaista miestä on harvoin nähty. Eivätkä turhaan puhuneetkaan, koska oli Emppu juovuksissa koko ajan, laulaa rilluteltu huumorilauluja torilla ja hotellissa ja missä kulkkisin, kaikki juotti, koko markkinaväen, ja missä naisen tapasi,

155 “[H]yvä mies se oli Lerkkanen, mona miestä tappoi...” (TF 18.)
Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation

The young man does his best to adjust himself as Riitu’s audience. Even though he considers Riitu insane and understands that Riitu’s stories are at least partly fictional, he actively participates in the storytelling. For example, he completely agrees with Riitu that his life “sure was” a fine one.

As the story continues, Lerkkanen is stabbed and Riitu recounts how he took his friend to a doctor, explaining to the protagonist:

– [...] And there was quite a stitching, you should have seen! But sure the doctor was good as well. Yeah, he was good, he was the best there has been… Let me think, what was his name?
– Was it Finckelman? I asked without hesitation and offered a good name for Riitu to use. I don’t know how it occurred to me, I just thought it was a fitting name for a doctor.
– Vinkkelsman? Could it have been… [...] That’s it! Vinkkelsman, that was it.

– [...] Ja siinä sitä olikin ompelemista, olisitpas nähnyt! Mutta kyllä piti oleman hyvä lääkärikin. Oli, oli se hyvä, paras se oli mitä on ollut… Annappas olla, mikäs se nimi olikaan?
– Oliko se Finckelman? Kysyin siekaile matta ja tarjosin Riitun käyttääviksi hyvää nimeä. En tiedä, mistä se juolahti mieleeni, mielestäni se oli vain sopiva nimi lääkärille.
– Vinkkelsman? Olisikohan tuo ollut… [...] Justiin! Vinkkelsman, se se oli. (TF 20.)

The protagonist offers the name “Dr. Finckelman” to Riitu who does not first recall what the doctor was called, but after some reflection accepts the name and adopts the character into his story as someone whom he knows well: “Vinkkelsman.” The question then is: do Riitu’s stories have an aesthetic frame inside the storyworld? He recounts the stories as if they had actually happened, yet both the protagonist and the readers are aware that their degree of fictionality is high. Even with this awareness, the protagonist gradually becomes unsure about the status of Dr. Finckelman. The narrator recounts how he reflected on his conversation with Riitu on his way home:

Then I remembered Finckelman, a doctor, and who knows what newcomer in Riitu’s brain.

I laughed even more. After all, this “Finckelman” was my own invention. It was certain that that man did not exist. But there might have been some man, it occurred to me, something that has been a little like Finckelman. It might as well have been, it might. There are so many kinds of people in the world...

156 Riitu often mispronounces the foreign-sounding name in different ways, turning “Finckelman” to “Vinkkelsman,” “Vinkselman” or even “Hinkselmann.”

121
The young protagonist taps into one of the basic features of fiction: the idea of “what if,” that something could be or might have been (see Iser 1978, 231–232; Nielsen, Phelan & Walsh 2015; Zetterberg Gjerlevsen 2016). He creates a world of possibility, a world of “what if” inside his own world. But whereas usually people are able to navigate the borders of fiction and reality (we for example know when we have imagined something), these borders are becoming quite hazy in the protagonist’s mind: “did not exist” quickly turns into “there might have been” and “might as well have been.” The fictional is infiltrating the actual in the storyworld. Ultimately Riitu’s story about Lerkkanen and Dr. Finckelman who, as we will learn, kills his patients by poisoning them, forms a mise-en-abyme structure that becomes important for the whole novel (see Salin 2002, 214).

Later, in Chapter 11, the story becomes more and more vivid and the borders between what is real and what is not become even more porous. The narrator recounts how he found Riitu in his cottage (which is revealingly divided into two parts\(^\text{157}\)) in a confused state. Riitu explains to the young man that Lerkkanen has returned and that he is lurking behind the window. Riitu behaves in a way that most people would likely regard as paranoid or even psychotic, and the young protagonist, too, is alarmed. What follows is a curious mixture of denials and confirmations. The events continue to be narrated from the perspective of the young man and he first denies that he was at all afraid: he knows that this is all just imagination and that Lerkkanen cannot actually be there. However, the narrator’s description of his bodily reaction reveals an experience of paralyzed fear: “I was not at all afraid… my feet were strangely powerless.”\(^\text{158}\) The denial is then repeated, but this time the protagonist admits that he did actually have doubts, and finally that he was actually praying to God in panic:

I was definitely not afraid, no, but I couldn’t help thinking that who knows about these lunatics, and with an ax. And how about Lerkkanen in the window? What if there are mysterious things… I prayed to God in a panic [...].

---

\(^\text{157}\) As Salin (2002, 87–88) notes, the description of Riitu’s cottage is one of the only portrayals of “outside” reality in the whole novel. The divided cottage seems to function as a symbol for Riitu’s divided selfhood: he is hiding the secrets of his past in the closed part of the cottage which he calls “the holiest place” (TF 55).

\(^\text{158}\) “En suinkaan pelännyt… jalkani olivat kumman voimattomat” (TF 74).
Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation

The denials and confirmations give an impression of two voices in conflict with one another, communicated by the narrator to the readers: one part of the protagonist is trying to deny that he was afraid and keeps up an appearance; the other part, which ultimately wins, admits the fear.

The scene itself offers several paths for interpretation: Riitu can be read as a mad, psychotic character (whose mental state is caused by guilt, as we might suspect in the end, after learning from Oskari that he has killed people), or he could be read as having some kind of “mystical” knowledge or connections to mysterious, horrible things. In fact, Riitu has been talking about “a secret” and a “mountain,” which he wants to buy from the protagonist, and at the end of Part One, it turns out that there is a secret source of ore in the ground under the closed part of his cottage. The young protagonist’s fear can also be interpreted in different ways: either he is afraid of Riitu’s perceived madness and him running around with the ax, or he is scared that Lerkkanen is really there and horrible things are happening—which ultimately forces him to turn to God for help. Finally, the readers’ reactions to the scene are also likely to be twofold: the protagonist’s fear invites sympathy, and while his efforts to hide it distance us from him, we might also feel a connection to the narrator who seems to try to convey his past experience honestly. The narrative voice is doubled, or even tripled: the young protagonist first denies that he was afraid and ultimately admits it, while the narrator performs the task of communicating both his past fear and his efforts to hide it to the readers.

Later in the same chapter, Riitu slips a name to the protagonist, “Ellinora,” and more fearful thoughts and suspicions arise in his mind. He starts to suspect that there is something badly wrong with Riitu:

Who knows where he has come from, I thought, who knows what he has done... And strange things, horrible things flickered in my mind. I am suspecting something here, I thought. I am quite the man for suspecting...

At the same time, I felt that Riitu was an incredibly pitiful human being. But on the other hand, it is his own business, if he has sinned.

Mikä sen tietä mistä se on tullut, ajattelin, kukaties on tehnyt vaikka mitä... Ja mielessäni välähti outoja asioita, vallan hirveitä. Minä aavistan tässä jotakin, ajattelin. Olempa aika poika aavistamaan...

Samalla minusta tuntui, että Riitu oli hyvin säältävä ihminen. Mutta toisaalta oli asia niinkin, että omapa on asiansa, mitäs on syntiä tehnyt.

(TF 78.)
The novel is pervaded with events that can be read in two ways, and the narrator-protagonist himself constantly offers multiple possible interpretations for everything that happens. He continuously raises doubts and makes vague hints about something “horrible” and “suspicious,” while at the same time trying to convince (himself as a young man? his audience at the time of narration?) that he did not believe in anything evil or mysterious, or even care. Again, note the structure of proposition-negation: the narrator first reveals that he pitied Riitu, but his attitude immediately changes into indifference.

When reading Tohtori Finckelman multiple times, more and more of these instances of double meaning come to the surface. Korpela has designed a thick narrative structure which continuously offers new layers for a careful reader, opening up different possible approaches to the characters’ experiences and the events. Ultimately, the novel resembles the famous duck-rabbit illusion: an ambiguous image that can be either interpreted as either animal. The novel offers evidence for psychological and mystical interpretations, but constantly challenges both: psychological interpretation is countered with the metafictional and mystical elements, and vice versa. Moreover, Tohtori Finckelman is not fantasy or horror fiction: the invitations to fantastic interpretations tend to be offered ironically, inside the frame of a Bildungsroman or a modernist, existentialist work (see also Salin 2002, 220).

The Power of Fiction

When reading the first part of the novel, we learn how the protagonist spends time inside his own vivid imagination. He often feels lonely and like an outsider, and in these moments, he starts to think about writing a novel, something that other people would read. After all, he now has plenty of material:

Sometimes the idea came to my mind that I could perhaps write a novel. [...] I did have more than plenty of material; that was not a problem. But I did not write, I had enough money anyway.

It would have been funny, though, if there were also one novel written by me. People would read it dumbfounded, I figured.

Joskus tuli mieleeni, että voisihan kirjoittaa romaanin. [...] olihan minulla aineksia riittämiin; niistä ei ollut puutetta. Mutta minä en muuten kirjoittanut, rahaa kun oli ilmankin.

Olisi se kuitenkin ollut huivittavaa, jos olisi yksi minunkin kirjoittamani romaani. Sitä monet lukisivat ihmeissään, tuumailin. (TF 31.)

159 The image first appeared in the 23 October 1892 issue of Fliegende Blätter, a German humorous magazine, and it became famous in the 1950s through Ludwig Wittgenstein’s posthumous writings.
Yet, by the logic of proposition-negation, the young protagonist instantly denies the idea and reduces it into a question of needing the money (an ironic statement, knowing the reality of the profession). All the time, it is evident that he is very interested in becoming a writer. One reason—as readers can infer from the way the passage continues—is that he wants to get the attention of a certain police chief’s daughter. He walks in the forest and creates imaginary conversations with the girl:

Did you not guess at all? I would ask her, and she would be amazed. I had no idea, she would reply filled with awe. It is too late now, I would say mysteriously and then I would turn to go—to create a new novel... (TF 31.)

Ettekö yhtään arvannut? minä kysyisin häneltä hänen ällistyksensä lomassa. En voinut aavistaakaan, hän vastaisi täynnä kunnioitusta. Se on myöhäistä nyt, sanoisin arvoituksellisesti ja kääntyisin mennäkseni, – luomaan uutta romania... (TF 31.)

It becomes clear that he wants to impress the girl—only to reject her. In his mind, there is a whole imaginary world in which he is a famous writer and admired by the police chief’s daughter. Imagination allows him to reinvent himself and being a novelist would offer him certain powers: at this point, power to impress and reject the girl, but, as we will learn later, a more sinister power to control other people.160

Other forms of narratives and storytelling are introduced in Part One and become important as the story progresses. The stories which the other men of the novel tell about women reveal a highly misogynous worldview. For example, Simpanen and Riitu often talk about women as “whores”—and we can recall Riitu’s story about Emppu Lerkkanen “grabbing” women. In a conversation about the police chief’s daughter, Riitu suggests to the young protagonist that “if Vinkselman had been there” he could have “taken all the girls.”161 This talk seems to offer the men power to control women: in their imagination, women do what the men want. However, the men’s behavior is repeatedly questioned in the novel: the conversations between the men—which often occur while doing “men’s work” in the hayfield—can be read as a parody of discourses in which women are seen as property of men and categorized as sluts and whores (or virgins and saints, as we will soon see; see also Salin 1996, xi; 2002, 191).

160 As Salin (2002, 209–210) notes, the idea of a writer’s profession is already ironic here, as it turns out that the protagonist’s motive for writing is to take revenge on the police chief’s daughter: “I was almost laughing when I thought about a book about Riitu and Lerkkanen and Dr. Finckelman and a certain feckless woman who would be the daughter of a police chief; what a hussy...” (“Minua melkein nauratti, kun ajattelin kirjaa Riitusta ja Lerkkasesta ja tohtori Finckelmanista ja eräästä naisen kekkaleesta, joka olisi maalaispitajän nimismiehen tyttär; aika letukka...”) (TF 31.)

161 “Vinkselman jos olisikin ollut, niin sinä olisit ottanut kaikki tytöt.” (TF 29.)
When reading Part One further, it becomes clear that many of the events revolve around the young protagonist’s love affairs: he first falls in love with his maid Marke (I return to her later), then with the police chief’s daughter and finally with a mysterious actress whom he sees performing as Joan of Arc, “the Holy Virgin,” in a church play. Although the young protagonist actively participates in the men’s talk about “whores” in the hayfield, he often escapes into the forest and imagines romantic encounters. He even has his “own stone” on which he sits and thinks about a “lonely flower”—or in fact, about the police chief’s daughter, as the following passage reveals:

Such was my stone, my own stone. I often returned to sit on it and sitting there my heart beautifully pined away. Next to the stone there was a lonely flower, and I always watched it and asked myself if I was a friend of the flowers, if they felt that I was their brother. And the flower replied yes, nodding its head in the wind, it too was longing for a different life, one that is told about in novels.

I sit [sic] on my stone, I caress its surface, I am so alone. I wish that a miracle would happen, and the police chief’s daughter would also come. I would show her my stone, I would say: Here sure is a good stone. Please, sit down…

At first, the protagonist talks to the “flower” who, in his mind, longs for a different life “in the novels.” In the second paragraph, the tense suddenly changes into the historical present: the narrator disappears completely to the background and we learn how the protagonist actually longs for the police chief’s daughter and talks to her in his imagination. Unfortunately, despite his fantasies and dreams of a “miracle,” she never comes to accompany him on the stone. The protagonist’s fantasies are comical in all their lyrical pompousness and obvious projection of emotions, but we can sympathize: he is lonely, longing for a connection to another human being. He dreams of a life that is depicted in novels and imagines flowers as his friends who understand him. Most importantly, he dreams of the police chief’s daughter.

Toward the end of Part One, things start to go awry for the young protagonist. He goes to meet the police chief, runs into the daughter but gets confused in his words and feels that he is ridiculed first by her and then by her father (I return to this scene in 3.3). He ends up lying that Hoikkanen (the other vagabond staying at his farm) had stolen money from him. Lying appears to be a way to control the situation, and he spins the lie until he himself believes in it: “perhaps he had stolen, he might as well have.” 162 Just like when Dr. Finckelman was invented, gradually something that is clearly invented becomes something that could have been, and the borders between real and imaginary become hazy in the protagonist’s mind. At the same time, he feels humiliated and alienated from others and from the social world:

I returned home with a heavy heart. I felt that this parish and environment do not suit me. Nobody understands me here.

Raskain mielin palasin kotiin. Minusta tuntui, että tämä pitäjä ja ympäristö ei sovi minulle. Täällä ei minua ymmärrätä. (TF 88.)

After the failure and the embarrassment with the police chief and the daughter, we can notice that he moves his love interest to a new object, the actress who plays Joan of Arc. After the performance, there is a dance at the church, and the protagonist enacts a romantic scene in which he and the actress dance together, over and over again: “[…] I asked her again to dance. And even after that, I danced with her the whole evening.” 163 It is however completely uncertain whether any of this actually happens or whether the protagonist imagines the scene (and the narrator recounts the events without hinting that they are imaginary). When it is time for the actress to leave for the city, the young man is forced to come down to earth. The narrator recounts his poetic lamentations:

So, she was gone, my Holy Virgin, only gray life and great emptiness remained, my soul was a deserted house and the wind blew the hymn of the passion week in the pines. And I felt that my heart was now only a mechanical organ, part of my entrails, and its only purpose was to keep me alive. Nothing more! It did not have any grand purpose anymore, I felt it now, not after the Holy Virgin had gone and taken away the meaning of my life.

Niin hän oli mennyt, minun Pyhä Neitsyeni, jäljelle jäi vain harmaa elämä ja suuri tyhjyys, sieluni oli autio talo ja tuuli veisasi männikössä kärkimysviikon virttä. Ja minusta tuntui, että sydämeni oli nyt vain pelkkä konemainen elin, osa sisälmyksiäni, jonka vähäisenä tehtävänä oli pitää henkeä yllä. Ei muuta! Mitään suurta tarkoituutta sillä ei enää ollut, sen tunsin nyt, ei sen jälkeen kun Pyhä neitsyt oli lähenyt ja vienyt mennessään minun elämäni tarkoituksen. (TF 91.)

The protagonist’s heart is now only a “mechanical organ” and his life has no meaning. As one of the early critics of Tohtori Finckelman, Kauko Kare, puts it with a hint of irony: the protagonist sounds like an “Eastern Finnish version” of the romantic poet Heinrich Heine (Kare 1952/1996, 362). His loneliness and efforts to communicate are likely to invite sympathy in readers. On the other hand, he appears as a pitiful character in all his pompousness, clichés, and insecurities. Furthermore, the narrator seems to be conveying here his past thoughts reliably, in all their melancholy and pining, inviting his readers closer.

---

162 “Ja kukaties oli varastanutkin, oli hyvinkin voinut.” (TF 88.)
163 “hain häntä vielä uudemman kerran. Ja vielä senkin jälkeen, tanssin hänen kanssaan koko illan.” (TF 90.)

So, at the end of Part One, the protagonist has lost “the meaning of his life.” He starts to dream about living in the city, and finally, because of his problems with the police chief, Oskari suggests that it would be best if he moved there to study. He does so, leaving Oskari to take care of the farm and the financial issues to his uncle who is his guardian (and who is often discussed but whom readers never encounter, and who suddenly dies at the beginning of Part Two). The protagonist believes that university life will suit him but as we soon learn, it does not offer him any relief:

I had always thought: wait, once you get to university, your life will change... But how strange, it never changed; it still carried the stigma of half-heartedness, my life I mean.

Olin aina ajatellut, että odotahan, kunhan pääset yliopistoon, niin elämäsi muutuu... Mutta merkillistä, ei se vain muuttunut, sillä oli edelleenkin puolisaisuuden leima, elämälläni nimittäin. (TF 105.)

A pattern is emerging: real life is not enough, and one has to resort to novels, fiction, and imagination in order to “truly live.”

Composing a Life

Part One, “The Heritage,” ends when the protagonist’s hopes about the police chief’s daughter are crushed, the mysterious actress (“Joan of Arc,” “the Holy Virgin”) has taken away “the meaning of his life,” and he feels like an outsider and that his life is “half-hearted”—even after he has moved to the city and become a medical student. One meaning for the title “Heritage” comes from Riitu the last time they meet, just before the protagonist leaves the farm. First Riitu warns him of becoming “Hinkselmann”:

Who knows, what if you become a big man ... worthy of Hinkselmann ...
If you become that sort ... oh horror ...

Mikä sen tietää, vaikka sinusta paisuisi suurikin herra ... Hinkselmannin arvoinen ... Semmoinen jos sinusta tuleekin, niin ... voi kauheeta ... (TF 102.)

164 Riitu mispronounces the name again. The form “Hinkselman” could be read as a reference to Hitler, as Salin (2002, 103, 236) has suggested.
But moments later, as can be anticipated, Riitu completely changes his tone and promises that in exchange for “the mountain” (the land under the closed part of his cottage), the protagonist will get “the name and the reputation of Vinskelmann,” “a sort of inheritance.” The second part of the novel begins some years later, leaving a gap in the protagonist’s whereabouts in between. The two final pages of Part One only reveal in a short summary that during the protagonist’s studies, Riitu dies and the protagonist and Oskari find ore in the ground under the closed part of the cottage, and then the protagonist ends up in financial trouble and is forced to give up his farm, which the uncle buys at a very low price.

Part One foreshadows everything that will happen later in the novel. It introduces the protagonist’s experience that full life is lived in novels (or in imagination) and his partly-denied dream that he himself would write a novel. It depicts his first experiences of “half-heartedness” and alienation, and most importantly, it shows the invention of Dr. Finckelman and the gradual breakdown of borders between fiction and reality. We also hear the stories that the young protagonist learns from the men at the farm and which we later can understand as shaping his worldview. Furthermore, the plot of the story follows different generic frames:

i) A picaresque: an orphaned young man goes through adventures with other men.

ii) A realist Bildungsroman: a young boy is becoming a man and leaves his home in the countryside to become educated in the city.

iii) A fairytale (with reversed gender roles and perspective): a young man dances with a mysterious girl who then disappears into the night.

iv) A horror story (with elements from children’s tales, gothic stories and novels): a young man encounters a mysterious old witch in a strange cottage (i.e., Riitu), an evil mad scientist (Dr. Finckelman) is killing people, and dead people are rising from their graves.

One might say that it is no wonder that the protagonist is suffering from “half-heartedness”—after all, he is very much a fictional, literary character. Part One thus prepares a situation in which readers should be highly aware that the narrator-protagonist is viewing his life in terms of fiction.

The communicative structure of Part One is complex: the more or less unreliable narrator leaves gaps in the story, he enhances his narrative so that it is “more accurate than reality,” and he often leaves his readers uncertain whether the things he tells are imagined or happening in the storyworld. This is a storytelling style that he seems to have “inherited” from Riitu (see also Salin 2002, 61): there are gaps, inconsistencies, and curious hints. It is also clear that the details we learn are a result of a careful composition: motifs and themes get repeated and gain new meanings in Part Two. It is however difficult to determine whether it is the narrator who composes his life in this way—or the author communicating to readers, creating connections and warning us of the narrator’s unreliability. What adds to the ambiguity of the text is that although the narrator clearly colors and modifies his account, the perspective in Part One is nonetheless mostly that of the young protagonist: the narrator sometimes evaluates the events and sometimes his voice and perspective become visible, but most often he remains completely invisible, making readers feel that the voice we hear and the perspective from which the events are seen belong to the young man.

165 “Lupasipa Riitu minulle kaupanpäällisiksi vielä “Vinskelmannin nimen ja maineen”, “Kuin perinnöksi”, sanoi hän.” (TF 104.)

166 Salin (2002, 101) has paid attention to Riitu’s witch-like qualities.

In Part Two, the fictional elements and aesthetic composition of the text become more visible: the narrator can be distinguished from his past self more easily and he also starts to reflect on the construction of his novel (“This chapter must definitely be read”); “My novel begins”167). He also plays with techniques of consciousness presentation, sometimes infiltrating the minds of his characters and revealing what “everybody thought” or “what an outsider felt.”168 Readers are thus reminded at regular intervals that the narrator is telling a story: that he has the power to control what he narrates and that he is even in charge of the minds of the other characters (as a narrator but also as a psychiatrist). However, at the same time the protagonist and other characters “can be imagined in flesh and blood,” as many readers of Tohtori Finckelman have described.169

167 “Tämä luku on ehdottomasti luettava.” (TF 122.); “Romaanini alkaa.” (TF 123.)
168 When the protagonist and Oskari attend the funeral of the protagonist’s uncle, the narrator narrates the thoughts of “everybody”: “May his dust rest in peace, everybody thought.” (“Rauha hänen tomulleen, kaikki ajattelivat.”) (TF 114, emphasis mine.) Interestingly, what “everybody thought” has the same ironic, mocking tone as the narrator’s own thinking that is already familiar to the readers: the word “soul” is replaced with the word “dust” in the common funeral phrase. In a later scene, the narrator creates a complicated structure of different minds: “And judge Niilas, walking on the street, felt the heavy burden of the societal responsibilities on his shoulders, this is what an outsider felt.” (“Ja tuomari Niilas tunsi katua kulkiessaan yhteiskunnallisten velvollisuuksien raskaan painon hartioillaan, siltä sivullisesta tuntui.”) (TF 132.) The narrator first seems to narrate what judge Niilas is feeling, but then reveals that he is actually narrating what an “outsider” observing Niilas feels that Niilas is feeling: readers are thus poignantly reminded that “Niilas’s thought” is the narrator’s construction. Furthermore, the comment is highly ironic, since readers already know that the narrator thinks that Niilas is interested in “public service” only to benefit himself, and that the burden he might feel surely is not coming from the society. In a third example, the narrator quotes the thoughts of Raiski but goes on to reveal that he is only speculating: “Those kind of thoughts probably circulated in Raiski’s brain” (“Tuollaiset ajatukset varmaankin risteilivät Raiskin aivoissa”) (TF 218, emphasis mine). (See also Salin 2002, 182.)
169 E.g., author Pentti Holappa writes in his review of Tohtori Finckelman that Korpela is “in possession of a rich gallery of characters, that can be imagined in flesh and blood.” (“[H]änellä on hallussaan rikas henkilögalleria, elävään lihaan ja vereen kuveltattava.”) (Holappa 1952/1996, 359.) According to Kauko Kare’s review: “Regarding the author’s examples, i.e., his humans, they are aptly, even delightfully characterized. Only writer Raiski and Miss Lilian appear bloodless. But even more cheerful are the original characters of the countryside
In the following section, I first look more carefully at the initial picture of the protagonist as a living being who feels and suffers—a picture which, I claim, persists throughout the novel, despite all the hints about the fictionality and constructedness of his mind and identity. I then turn to Part Two in which the oscillation between real and fictional becomes a guiding principle of the text: I discuss how the affective and the artificial are intertwined in a complicated way, inviting readers to oscillate between psychological and metafictional readings as well as empathy and distancing.

3.2. Man or Machine? Psychological and Metafictional Readings

Father was dead, mother was dead. And sisters and brothers—they had never existed. So dark, so dark, I talked in a low voice and let also my flower understand that this land is a land of sorrow. Not that I felt sad. Why would I feel sad!

Isä oli kuollut, äiti oli kuollut. Ja sisaret ja veljet—ei ollut heitä ollutkaan. Synkkää on, synkkää on, puhelin puolilääneen ja annoin kukkaniin ym-märtää, että murheen maa on tämä maa. Ei niin, että olisin surrut. Mitäpä minä suremaan! (TF 12.)

As we have seen, the narrator-protagonist of Tohtori Finckelman is revealed to be divided in some way already in the preface of the novel: we first encounter him as memoirist looking at himself from the outside, changing positions, and struggling to put his experiences into words. At the very beginning of Part One—when he is a young man—his dividedness manifests itself in the form of melancholic thoughts about life, the future, his dead parents (and siblings who never existed)—which are then often instantly denied, as in the passage above: “Why would I feel sad!” As discussed, when depicting his youth, the narrator mostly adapts to his young self’s position: the perspective and discourse are controlled by the young man whose internal voice and thoughts the narrator reports. But a style of thinking that is familiar from the preface is also here: the young man is contradicting himself all the time, his moods are changing, and he is shifting his points of view, changing registers from tragic outbursts to denials and hyperbolic claims. He is also very conscious of himself: he constantly imagines village, especially old men like Oskari and Riitu who are combine both grotesqueness and humanity.” (“Mitä kirjailijan esimerkkeihin, so. hänen ihmisissään tulee, he ovat ylipäätään sattuvasti ja jopa herkullisesti karakterisoituja; vain kirjailija Raiski ja neiti Lilian vaikuttavat veretömiltä. Sitä riemullisempia ovat maalaiskylän originaalit, varsinkin Oskarin ja Riitun tapaiset ukonrähjät, joissa yhdistyvät sekä irvokkuus että ihmillisys.”) (Kare 1952/1996, 362.)

---

what others might think of him and goes through feelings of deep loneliness and alienation from the social world.

The following passages from the beginning of the novel are worth quoting in full:

I was not sick or anything, it was otherwise hard. I wonder if other people feel the way I do, I thought then. I hoped that it would be hard for others as well. But I did not mention this to anyone, it would not have been appropriate.

I may have been walking on a road. --- It is [sic] afternoon, nature is flourishing, there is everything there should be in the summer, even the sun is there. I look at it, the sun. It is surprisingly far away, I suddenly think, much farther than I have imagined. [...]

I look around, and at once I feel as if the power of the sun isn't unshakable after all as I have sometimes thought. For even the sun will go out one day... And anxiety overcomes me because even the sun will go out and the fate of humanity is at stake. I look at the sun through my fingers, and it is as if I could already see black dots, and there is an ominous mist before it. Yes, yes, nothing lasts forever...

Saatoin kuljeskella tietä pitkin. --- On [sic] iltapäivä, luonto kukoistaa, on kaikki mitä kesällä on, aurinkokin. Minä sitä katselen, aurinkoa. Se on odottamattoman kaukana, tulee äkkiä mieleeni, paljon kauempana kuin olen kuvitellutkaan. [...] Katselen ympärilleni, ja samalla tuntuu kuin aurinkon valta ei olisikaan järkkymätön kuten olen joskus arvellut. Sillä kerran on sammuva sekin ... Ja ahdistus valtaa minut, koska aurinkokin sammuu ja ihmiskunnan kohtalo on vaakalaudalla. Tirkistelen sitä sormien läpi, ja on kuin näkisin jo tummia täpliä, ja sen edessä on enteellistä usvaa.

Niinpä niin, mikään ei ole ikuista... (TF 9–10.)

Life is hard for the young protagonist. He hopes that others would feel as bad as he does but realizes that such thoughts are not socially acceptable. As in the flower scene discussed above, the narrator suddenly moves completely to the background and the tense changes from past to historical present: the discourse becomes controlled by the experiencing I and it is as if we are moved to the past moment. Yet there are hints that the scene is imagined: “I may have been walking on a road,” states the narrator just before the shift (which is marked with three dashes in the text). A short description of flourishing summer nature follows, and suddenly the protagonist has an anxious, melancholy thought that the sun is going to die. He starts to imagine “black dots” and an “ominous mist” before the sun. As in the examples cited above, something he first only imagines suddenly becomes true in his mind, until he shifts his position again. The passage continues:
I look at the ground and, on the surface, just above ground level, I appear to see some kind of a veil, like a spider’s web: it covers the ground completely. I see it, it is below my eyes, about one meter from the ground. It makes the ground very beautiful, much more beautiful than it would be otherwise. But at the same time so sad. I walk through the veil, I make a long hole in it. But when I look behind, I can’t see the hole any more, it is walled up. And I become sadder and sadder, I feel like crying. Yes, yes, so it begins, I say to myself and pray to God for forgiveness. And I see the flowers and the bushes under it, they are so sad, they feel so heavy. It is hard to breathe... Does it exist, I thought then. I wonder if other people see it?

And I was sure that the veil didn’t exist. I shivered, and I said that it is only an illusion, this person’s life...

I take the flower in my hands, it was yellow. It is now in my hand, I caress it, and I feel much better. It is my friend now, it is above the veil and the judgment cannot reach it. We are inseparable...

He sees a “veil” that makes the ground beautiful and sad at the same time. The atmosphere in the forest is strange: the young man becomes inexplicably sad, he feels like crying and prays to God for “forgiveness.” He feels that the flowers and bushes under the veil are sad too, projecting his own sadness onto the flowers: they feel heavy; it is hard to breathe. Then the tense changes again and the narrator reappears: he reports how he wondered whether other people saw the veil, and for a moment he seems to understand that the veil was not real. Then there is a shift back to the present tense, to the full perspective of the young protagonist (the narrator’s voice only briefly interrupts as he mentions that the flower “was” yellow). He is now caressing the flower in his hand, as if saving it from under the veil and from mysterious “judgment.” He says that he feels better, that he and the flower are “friends,” “inseparable.”

As the passage goes on, the protagonist continues talking to “his flower.” He goes to the shore, notices a strange veil also above the water, and decides to take his boat out onto it. He is rowing, bragging about how well he rows, yet melancholy, and soon loses the meaning of what he is doing:

I row a long way. Until I realize that it is all for nothing, why would I row. For if there happens to be talk about me only rowing and not working, it is my own business. The boat is my own and the water belongs to everyone. But I am not interested in rowing, and that is another matter.

Soudan pitkän matkan. Kunnes huomaan, että se on aivan turhaa, mitäpä minä soutamaan. Sillä jos siitä puhe on, että minä vain soutelen enkä ole töissä, niin se on oma asiainen, oman on venhe ja vesi on yhteinen. Mutta minua ei soutaminen huvita ja se on asia erikseen. (TF 11.)

The protagonist seems both anxious and rebellious. He is constantly thinking what others are thinking about him, forming a kind of double consciousness in which he is adapting to the position of others potentially looking at him. Finally, he brushes off the thought of others, regains his sense of agency and returns to the thought that he himself does not want to row.

The way the text invites readers to engage with the narrator-protagonist is complex. On the one hand, the protagonist discloses experiences of loneliness, sadness and anxiety which are relatable to anyone. They are about basic existential questions: one’s relation to oneself and others, and how social norms shape experience (for example, what is expected of a young man or a farm owner). On the other hand, the overly dramatic tone of the text, the hyperboles, and the contradictions seem designed to make readers distance themselves from the protagonist. The young man’s experiences are somewhat extreme: there is a delusional quality to his thoughts about the sun dying (although in fact this will happen); they create a reference to the “black sun” of melancholia (see also Salin 2002, 54), and his experience of the veil and the way he projects his emotions onto the flowers remind of a delusional atmosphere. Moreover, even in his affective inner monologues, the protagonist is constantly borrowing elements from elsewhere, using clichés, and adopting forms of expression from religious discourses (constantly starting sentences with the conjunctions ja and sillä, “and” and “for,” evoking a biblical style). Lyricalness and pompousness are intertwined, which reminds readers that the words he uses are not his own but belong to different discourses. Yet, there is a powerful invitation to an empathetic reading: all readers are likely to be familiar with the negative, intense emotions and feelings (loneliness, insecurity, struggle to fit into social norms), 170 However, the difference, to e.g., the protagonist of Kaunis sielu, is that the protagonist of Tohtori Finckelman is a member of socially powerful groups: he is a heterosexual young man and a farm owner. The double consciousness in Tohtori Finckelman also connects the novel to the existentialist tradition and Jean-Paul Sartre’s idea of bad faith, mauvaise foi.

171 Korpela’s father, Simo Korpela, was a famous hymnwriter and this background is visible in Korpela’s works (Laitinen 1997, 461).
and readers are also predisposed to the protagonist’s melancholic thoughts for long periods of time (see Booth 1983, 378; Keen 2013, #9).

Looking closely, there are subtle hints which are likely to gain meaning only on a second reading, in the light of what is to come. The protagonist feels that he is an outsider, a stranger. He also constantly looks at himself as if from the outside. We see him evaluating whether he fits the social norms—and rebelling against the idea that he does not. It is easy to read the story as a portrayal of a young man’s life and psychology: he has romantic troubles and social insecurities, though he hides these with his ironic statements and constant bragging and denials. Like the narrator of Hämäläinen’s Kaunis sielu, he often takes refuge in his imagination and fantasies when the social world causes him anguish. However, whereas the narrator of Kaunis sielu enacts a revolt against normative scripts of sexuality and gender, Korpela’s protagonist seems to be desperately trying to fit into his position as a young man and a farm owner.

Furthermore, read in the light of Part Two, the protagonist’s early experiences may be given also another meaning: an image of what psychiatrists have described as a “schizoid personality” is emerging. There are several connections: a strong emotional and social detachment from other people; proneness to excessive daydreaming and taking refuge in the non-human world; and, finally, a risk of developing psychosis. (See Sass 1994, 76–77; also DSM-5, 652–653.) From this perspective, the protagonist’s experiences of alienation, the veil, his refuge in the forest and inside his imagination, as well as his thoughts about flowers as his only friends, can be read as the first signs of a severe mental illness. Readers are thus gradually invited towards a psychological, even pathological interpretive frame. However, as I suggested at the end of the previous section, there is a deep irony in the protagonist’s dreams of living a “fuller life” in novels: he is a fictional character. This metafictional level is quite well hidden in Part One, and I would argue that it is not until readers finish Part Two that also the earliest hints of fictionality become meaningful. I return to this oscillation between psychological and metafictional readings in a moment. Before that, let us look at the main events and central motifs at the beginning of Part Two, in which the protagonist has become a psychiatrist working in a mental hospital.

Dr. Finckelman and Feelings of Being Non-Human

In Part Two, entitled “The Becoming of Flesh of Dr. Finckelman,” things start to get even more complicated. Some readers have described Part One as the “realist” and Part Two as the “sur-realist” level of the text. In this reading, the world and events portrayed in Part One would be actual, whereas Part Two 172 Annamari Sarajas (1953/1980, 61; 70) coins the term “sur-realist” (“ylirealistinen”), hinting at surrealism but also maintaining a distance from it (see also Envall 1988, 111).

---

would depict the narrator-protagonist’s imaginary-hallucinatory world. However, the borders between fiction and reality have blurred already in Part One. In Part Two the haziness is just more visible.

The protagonist now has an “esteemed” profession—the narrator begins the second part by emphasizing this. He is a doctor, a “nerve doctor,” working in a hospital and looking for a cure for madness—and we also learn that he has accumulated a good amount of wealth “with the aid of his profession.” But it soon becomes clear that he is unable to create meaningful connections to himself or his patients. The first chapter of Part Two (Chapter 16) returns to thoughts that are familiar from the end of Part One. There is an even stronger separation between the protagonist and other people who (he believes) live fuller lives than he does:

I did know that there were people who lived full lives, much better lives than I, people whose lives were like jolly novels and who were able to say on their death beds: I have lived! But where were they? I should have gotten to know them. Then I could ask them... For my life never, not even by chance, reached the point where real life begins, my life was always haunted by the stigma of half-heartedness.

The “full life” is something that people have in novels, and the protagonist is longing to find people who live such lives. He also returns to the thoughts about Dr. Finckelman:

But everything becomes old, everything becomes stale. Even flowers, patients, friends, everything. My soul is filled with wistful anxiety and I say like this: Well, well, Dr. Finckelman... I don’t say more because that was enough, those words contained a lot. The past life rushed into my mind, everything in it, thrown in front of me with one punch, all my youth. I watched it as if from a mirror. There were Oskari and Riitu and the police chief’s beautiful daughter, there were Lerkkanen and Finckelman and all the rest, they came to me and offered me their hand.

Mutta kaikki käy vanhaksi, kaikki väljäätyy. Kukkasetkin, potilaat, ystävät, kaikki. Sieluni on taas täynnä haikeaa ahdistusta ja minä sanon näin:

---

174 See especially TF 109–113. The description of psychiatry as a profession is highly ironic in the novel, see also 3.5. See Salin (2002, 109–113) for an analysis of the protagonist as a Faustian doctor.
Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation

So the protagonist is an adult, but nothing has worked out the way he dreamed. He is looking back to his youth “as if in a mirror,” and there are familiar people, Oskari, Riitu, and the police chief’s daughter, but also his imaginary friends, “Lerkkanen and Finckelman and all the rest” who appear to him as if they were alive.

A few pages later, the real and the unreal begin to blend also on the level of the storyworld, not just in the protagonist’s “mirror-like” memories. Riitu has been dead for several years and the protagonist’s uncle and former guardian has also suddenly died. The protagonist and Oskari are visiting Riitu’s grave after the uncle’s funeral when suddenly the graves seem to open:

We stayed there [at Riitu’s grave] when everyone else had left.
It was quiet.
And suddenly I felt as if the graves were opened and the dead were rising from under the ground. And they all wore this and that, mostly naked, and the flesh had fallen off them. And they made a long procession, these shadows of the dead, and it crawled forward, I don’t know where. And when I watched more carefully, I was able to separate human features on their skeleton faces, familiar and strange. And I see Lerkkanen, alive, he is right at the front, and a knife is stabbed in his heart, blood is splashing everywhere. I am horrified for Lerkkanen. But when I lay my eyes on others, I notice that every one of them has scars and deep cut wounds around their body. “Who struck those?” I stammer in panic. “You will see!” old Riitu replies mysteriously and as if in passing as he drags along with the others. And they turn their heads as if in a march-past and they look at me with their deep eye sockets…

And Dr. Finckelman’s gaze is chilling and horrible…
– So you will give me the field if you win in court? asked Oskari, bringing me back to the world of the real people.

Me jäimme vielä sinne [Riitun haudalle], kun muut olivat lähteneet.
Vallitsi hiljaisuus.
For a moment, the protagonist enters another world. On one level, it is the world of his (and Riitu’s) imagination. It takes control of the protagonist’s experiential world, and because the perspective is tightly in the experiencing I, readers, too, are drawn inside it. It is a horrible world: the bodies of the people are slit; they have hollow eyes and Dr. Finckelman is there staring with a horrible look. On another level, the scene could be read as an allegory of the Second World War, which is never mentioned in the novel (as discussed in Chapter 1): the dead are wounded, fallen soldiers and Dr. Finckelman is the war.176 Oskari’s comment returns the protagonist to the “world of the real people”: he wants to know if the protagonist will give him a field if he wins a legal battle about the uncle’s will and inherits his estate (including his own former farm, which he had been forced to sell to his uncle).177 The paragraph-long move to the “other world” gives readers a hint of what is to come—and about the meaning of the title of Part Two: “The Becoming of Flesh of Dr. Finckelman.”

In the following chapters (17 and 18), the protagonist’s life of half-heartedness continues. The narrator tells the readers about his feelings of anxiety and disillusionment, and introduces his new acquaintances: writer Raiski, who is first introduced as a patient but soon as the protagonist’s “only friend”; businessman Mellonen, who is very interested in the ore business; and judge Niilas, a ladies’ man who helps the protagonist with legal problems and in return wants help in distracting his wife Irma from his extramarital affairs. We are also introduced to Saleva, an alcoholic former soldier who begs and ultimately tries to blackmail alcohol prescriptions from the protagonist (and who will later be accused of the rape), and Master Pomila (also called “Reverend Pomilov”), a virtuous tax man. In addition to these characters, in Chapter 18, which according 176 As mentioned in the introduction, Korpela did not discuss the war in almost any way in his first works although they were written soon after it. Rather, the novels are filled with allusions to violence like this, and when, in his final works, the war becomes the main subject, the violence disappears. (See also Salin 2002, 14; 224.) Yet, Tohtori Finckelman is connected to the war in many ways: through Korpela’s biography and the time of its publication; through Lieutenant Saleva’s character; through its themes of violence, guilt, and reconciliation; and especially through the connections to other postwar existentialist works like Camus’ L’Étranger and Mann’s Doktor Faustus (1947).

---

177 A very historically oriented reader might even read this conversation about land as an allusion to the war: in post-war Finland, land was given to the refugees from Karelia who had lost their farms.
Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation to the narrator “must definitely be read,” 178 we are introduced to Miss Lilian, Lili, who will become the center around which practically everything that happens in the rest of the novel revolves. “My novel begins,” 179 proclaims the narrator; Part One has only been a prelude.

At the very beginning of this “important” Chapter 18, we also learn a new manifestation of the protagonist’s feeling of “half-heartedness.” The narrator tells us he felt that he was “only a machine”:

Days went by. I walked around the hospital. I saw patients.
“Next!” I was like a machine.
[...]
For I was only a machine, and half-ready at that.

Päivät kuluivat. Kiertelin sairaalaa. Otin vastaan potilaita. ”Seuraava!”
Olin kuin kone.
[...]
Sillä minä olin vain kone, ja puolivalmis silloinkin.
(TF 122–123.)

This feeling of being a non-human is at first connected particularly to psychiatry: psychiatrists are depicted as mere machines, they seem to have all the knowledge in the world but are unable to use it to help anyone. The protagonist appears disappointed in his profession and his life. But, it seems, in this chapter everything is about to change. There is an immediate connection between the protagonist and Lili when they meet, and their experiences of anxiety and alienation turn out to be very similar. Lili (who is a dancer, perhaps also an actor) comes to the protagonist’s reception and tells him that she feels that her whole life is only an act:

Everyone acts, I too, even now, although I try to be myself as much as possible to give you a true description of the nature of my illness. In the park on my way here I thought that I should speak as if I did not speak at all. That is to say: to speak in the same way when I don’t speak at all, when I just let my thoughts and impressions speak, when I am alone, objectively...

Kaikki näyttelevät, minä näytteilen myös, nytkin, vaikka koetan olla oma itseni siinä määrin kuin se suinkin on mahdollista antaakseni teille oikean kuvan sairauteni laadusta. Ajattelin silloin tullessani puistikossa, että täyttyy puhua niin kuin ei itse puhuisikaan, siis puhua sillä tavalla kuin miten minä puhun silloin kun en ollenkaan puhu, vaan annan ajatusteni ja mielikuvieni puhua, yksin ollessani, objektiivisesti... (TF 124.)

She describes a sense of alienation from the world and a sense of acting. She also says that she often feels that she is only dreaming, describing what could be characterized as an experience of derealization: “Everything sort of disappears around me, I look at it and I say that this is like a dream. Is this a dream, I ask myself then. I am so ridiculous, don’t be offended. It’s not a dream, I know. But it’s very hard, I am often completely hopeless.” After this, empathetic readers’ hopes are up: Lili seems to be the one the protagonist has been looking for all along. They are “fellow-travelers,” “bonded by fate,” as some readers have described (see Sarajas 1953/1980, 72; Vainio 1975, 66). As Salin (2002, 89) has noted, there seems to be a telepathic connection between the two. In addition to revealing Lili’s and the protagonist’s mutual feelings of alienation and acting, the scene brings up questions about the problems of speech and communication and the desire to convey one’s experiences to others. Just like the narrator in the preface, Lili puts into words a dream of a language that would capture one’s thoughts and impressions and be something more, deeper than speech. Also, a possibility manifests itself, though we never get confirmation for this. Lili could be the actress from Part One—and it is later hinted that at least the protagonist starts to imagine that she is.

178 “Tämä luku on ehdottomasti luettava.” (TF 122.)
179 “Romaanini alkaa...” (TF 123.)

However, the protagonist keeps his distance from Lili. He explains to her: “one just has to adjust. That way you’ll get some certainty to your life, content. Because there is certainty, yes, one just has to get there. I spoke like a priest. But after she had gone it came to my mind whether I myself had any ‘certainty’, whether there were some improvements to be made also in my own life.” In the conversation, the protagonist hides behind his role of a psychiatrist, but when Lili has left, the narrator admits that he did have doubts—only to deny them immediately as usual, adding, “I was a doctor, I had to think about my patients, not myself.” After Lili has gone, the narrator claims in his incongruous way that “I forgot about her. Only sometimes she came to my mind.” Then he becomes even more melancholic and alienated than before. A concrete

---

180 “Ympäriltäni kaikki ikääkin kuino katoaa, minä katselen sitä ja sanon, että tämähän on kuin unta. Onko tänä unta, minä kysyn itseltäni silloin. Minä olen niin naurettava, älkää pahas-tuko. Ei se ole unta, kyllä minä tiedän. Mutta se on hyvin raskasta, olen usein aivan toivoton.” (TF 125.)

181 After having met Lili at the reception, the protagonist starts to recollect his encounter with the “Virgin of Orleans” (TF 158) in his youth and finally makes the connection explicit: “But when it comes to the virgin of Orleans, to tell you the truth, she wasn’t far away from Miss Lili. This is what I noticed to my wonder again. The thought haunted me like a shadow; I could not get rid of it.” (“Mutta mitä tuli Örleansin neitsyen, niin hänestä ei totta puhuen ol- lut pitkä matka neiti Lilianiin, sen huomasin ihmeekseni sitten taas. Tuo ajatus vainosi minua kuin varjo, en millään päässyt siitä irti.”) (TF 166–167.)

183 “[O]lin lääkäri, minun täyttyi ajatella potilaitani, ei itseäni” (TF 127.)

184 “Unohdin hänet. Vain joskus hän tuli mieleeni.” (TF 127.)
problem emerges: the protagonist is competing with his friends for Lili’s attention. Judge Niilas is in love with Lili and it is rumored that she is his new mistress; and writer Raiski starts to imagine that he is Lili’s long-lost father (or actually the protagonist plants this idea in Raiski’s mind). As many readers have suggested, Lili remains an inexplicable, unreadable character; a blank canvas on which the men of the novel seem to project themselves (see Koskimies 1952/1996, 364; Salin 2002, 158).

The following chapters begin with more ponderings about the artificiality of the protagonist’s life. Soon (at the beginning of Chapter 21), his thoughts about being a machine reach new heights:

And so I placed myself above everything that existed. Above all being.
I lived as if I did not exist.
Because why would one live through something that isn’t worth living! It is best just to appear to be being, just to seem something, give the others an impression as if there was some person, a human being, walking in my pants. This is what I thought and laughed at my patients, nurses, acquaintances, everybody who I managed to deceive in such a cunning way. They were actually under the illusion that it was me, a doctor, a psychiatrist. They did not guess that it was a completely different man: only a machine!

Siis asetuin yläpuolelle kaiken mitä yleensä oli. Olevaisen yläpuolelle.
Elin kuin minua ei olisi ollutkaan.
Sillä mitäpä elää sellaista, mikä ei ole elämisen arvoista! Siis paras vain olla olevinaan, vain näyttää joltakin, antaa toisille se vaikutelma kuin kulkisi minun housuissani joku henkilö, ihminen. Tuolla tavalla ajattelin ja naureskelin potilaita, hoitajia, tuttaviani, kaikkia, joita minun onnistui niin ovelasti harhauttaa. He olivat todella siinä uskossa, että minä olin minä, eräs lääkäri, psykiatri, eivät arvanneet, että se oli kokonaan toinen mies: vain kone! (TF 152–153.)

The narrator confesses to the readers that he was only giving an impression, an illusion of being human. At first the feeling of being a machine is a form of distance from oneself (from being alive and suffering), but slowly it also becomes a sign of separation from the social world. After this, the protagonist summons “his friends” from the past:

But there were moments when even I existed and was alive. “Come on in,” I might then say half-aloud, as if to myself. And they came, living creatures, and there was something consoling in the fact that they came.

In his imagination, he talks to Lerkkanen, who promises to provide him women. They have a party in which naked girls dance and “go from one lap to another,” except one girl, we are told, Ellinora (whose name was once briefly mentioned by Riitu), who “goes to Dr. Finckelman.” In the morning she is dead: someone has stabbed her and “nobody remembers anything.” The imaginary orgy ends and there is a change in register. The narrator suddenly describes how he moved “to a strange land”:

I moved quickly to a strange land. I don’t know how, me and all of my friends. And it was not such a strange land after all. It was more familiar than this old one, and still quite strange. [...] And it was as if there was a curtain above everything, one that nobody however saw. --- Everything is clean, clear contours, people slide beside me silently, soft as cats, they don’t even notice me, but they look at me for a long time... They are dead, like dream creatures, and still they are more alive than any one of those who I knew before.

The other land is peaceful: it is no longer a frightening place, but a place where his friends are. Even though the people there are dead, “like dream creatures,” they feel more alive than actual people. The “veil” the protagonist experienced as a young man in the forest is now a “curtain.” He feels at home in the other land:

I wander around the gravestones, here and there. It is so wonderfully peaceful over here, like being among my own people, I hear myself saying quietly. Then I return. I avoid people like plague, I stay far away from them, they are like shadow creatures in this world of reality.

---

185 “[H]e kiertävät sylistä sylin […].” (TF 153).
186 “[K]ukaan ei muista mitään...” (TF 153).
After returning to the real world, the narrator suddenly reveals that he was actually making “trips” like this constantly. We also find out that he is now making plans to start excavations at the farm (which he owns again after winning his legal battle with Niilas’s help), as the ore in the ground under Riitu’s former cottage might be considerable.\(^\text{187}\)

The text offers several paths for interpretation. The most empathetic one would be that the protagonist is disillusioned with his work and extremely disappointed in his life. He presumably has a traumatic past: both of his parents have died, and the beginning of the story is shadowed by the loss, which he nonetheless is unable to really feel or mourn.\(^\text{188}\) For him as an adult, one could think, all this is starting to take its toll. As Toini Havu writes in her review: “He himself knows that his life has started to go awry at the very beginning, that he is unable to feel the fullness of life.”\(^\text{189}\) The strange moves or trips to the “other land” as well as the experiences of seeing the past “as if in a mirror” could be read as symptoms of dissociative disorder caused by trauma (see DSM 5, 292).

Another thing which invites empathy for the protagonist is that he and Lili seem to suffer from the same condition, although he is unable to admit this to himself or to Lili, and rather hides behind his profession as a psychiatrist. Another interpretation would be mystical. There is something devilish going on: people die unexpectedly while the protagonist is becoming more and more wealthy. Following Riitu before him, he has made some kind of deal with the devil, a Faustian pact, as Salin (2002, 99–104) suggests. There is also the mystery of Lili’s uncanny resemblance with the actress of Joan of Arc, the “Holy Virgin.” I return to these interpretive paths in a moment, but let us first focus on the most notable ones: psychiatric illness (schizoid or dissociative personality) and then metafiction.

\(^{187}\) The protagonist’s mysterious “trip” is directly connected to the excavations: “In the morning I had returned from one of those trips, and I relive again and again those moods, I am as if in ecstasy when in the evening I go to take a letter to the station. I’m not hiding to whom it was addressed. It was for Oskari. I announced in it that the men and experts from the geological research center would soon come to my house. They would make even more elaborate studies at my lands and mountains, now for a conclusive time.” (“Olin aamulla palannut tuollaiselta retkeltä, elän yhä uudestaan noita tunnelmia, elän kuin hurmiossa, kun illan tullen lähdän viemään kirjettä asemalle. Enkä salaa kenelle se oli. Se oli Oskarille. Ilmoitin siinä, että pian jälleen tulee geologisen tutkimuslaitoksen miehiä ja asiantuntijoita minun taloon, he tulisivat tekemään entistä tarkempia tutkimuksia minun maillani ja vuorillani, nyt ratkaisevan kerran.”) (TF 155.) The excavation plan is on one level quite “realist” and practical, but its links to the Faustian myth and the way the narrator describes his “ecstasy” invite mystical and diagnostic interpretations.

\(^{188}\) See also Vainio 1975, 24. This inability to mourn the loss of his parents connects the protagonist directly to Camus’ Meursault in L’Étranger (see also Vainio 1975, 105; Salin 2002, 143).

\(^{189}\) “Itsekin hän tietää, että hänen elämänsä on alun perin lähtenyt menemään väärään suuntaan, että hän ei saa kosketusta elämän täyteliäisyteen.” (Havu 1952/1996, 355; see also Vainio 1975, 30.)
As Louis Sass (1994, 80) describes, following German psychiatrist Ernst Kretschmer (1888–1964), people suffering from schizoid personality are “people full of antithesis.” It is a personality that is split in two ways, first in relation to external reality and secondly in relation to the self: there is a feeling of estrangement or detachment from society, other people, and a feeling of alienation from oneself (Sass 1994, 76–77). As discussed, there is always a gap in subjectivity—when telling about oneself, one is always looking at oneself as if from the outside—but in schizoid personality the extreme gap between the public self and the “real” self often results in unconventional acts and in feelings of inauthenticity. People suffering from schizoid personality often feel a strong “as-if quality” in life: they feel that they are only role-playing, acting. (Sass 1994, 77.)

In addition to the protagonist’s “symptoms” described above—the feelings of half-heartedness, being a machine, and acting—his constant antitheses, proposition-negations, denials, and ironies can be read in terms of this dividedness. In other words, practically all the experiences the narrator describes are consistent with the common symptoms of schizoid personality. There is one important exception: whereas people with schizoid personality disorder often do not even care about making connections to other people (DSM-5, 653), the protagonist is constantly plagued by and suffers from his detachment from others, hides this in his hyperbolic statements, ironic remarks, and bragging, and, in Part Two, behind the “mask” of a psychiatrist.190

The protagonist’s suffering because of his detachment and alienation importantly reminds us that although he to some extent “fits” the category of a schizoid personality, there is always something that leaks outside the diagnostic boxes. If we were psychiatrists like the protagonist himself, we would probably try a different diagnosis: ultimately the way the protagonist travels between “the real world” and “the other world,” sees the past “as if in a mirror,” and starts to experience that his actions are “guided by an unknown force,” and finally “becomes” “Dr. Finckelman” suggest that he could be suffering from a dissociative disruption of identity, or from multiple personalities as many readers have suggested (e.g., Vainio 1971/1979, 35–36). However, as we read Part Two further, it becomes clear that there are also other possible interpretive paths than the psychological or pathological ones. Especially the protagonist’s relationship 190 When they first meet, Lili explicitly talks about a “face” that doctors put on when they encounter patients and describes the medical profession as a form of acting: “They say that doctors put on the face of a doctor when they talk with patients, that they act, for money even. It may be so, it probably is. But I must confess that you are a good actor. And that is enough.” (“Sanotaan, että lääkärit vaihtavat kasvoilleen lääkärin ilmeen potilaspuhuttelussaan, näyttelevät, vieläpä rahan tähden. Saattaa olla niin, varmasti onkin. Mutta minun täytyy tunnistaa, että olete hyvä näyttelijä. Ja se riittää.”) (TF 124.) Note also how Lili refuses to pass any judgement, although her comment about money could even be read as her way of connecting the medical profession to prostitution (of which she herself is accused). to the other characters invites readers to oscillate between psychological, meta-fictional, and intertextual readings.

Doubles, Projections, and Mirroring

As many readers of Tohtori Finckelman have remarked, all the other characters in the novel are in many ways the narrator-protagonist’s doubles or mirrors: he seems to reflect himself on others and project his experiences on them.191 Starting from the first encounter with Miss Lilian, readers are likely to realize that the borders between the protagonist and the other characters are extremely hazy. Particularly Lili seems to reflect his thoughts: what Lili says that she is experiencing is often even too close to what we have inferred about the protagonist’s own experiences. Before meeting Lili, there are also some other hints of the same phenomenon. The narrator for example occasionally mentions the chief physician of the hospital, who likewise says things that could be straight from the protagonist’s mouth: “So hard, so hard! People disgusting, life like a viscous stream. And I was just like the others, I finally noticed.”192

In Chapter 25, the protagonist and his friends spend a drunken evening at businessman Mellonen’s club. During the evening each character gives their ideas of what life is, and it seems that they are repeating different scenarios the protagonist has been contemplating. For example, writer Raiski offers a magnificent tautology of what life is and comes to the comical conclusion that, opposed to what the protagonist has been pondering since he was young, life is better than poetry: “Poetry is rubbish! Only living life itself is worth living.”193 Later in the evening, Master Pomila gives a drunken speech about life as a “hellish game,” about people as shadow creatures, and about the relationship between the self and the other. No one helps another but then: “a miracle happens: someone reaches out their hand.”194 He ends his speech by saying how glad he is that he has met Miss Lilian—seemingly echoing the protagonist’s hidden thoughts. Gradually it starts to look as if all the other characters were manifestations of the protagonist’s different sides: Mellonen focuses on becoming more and more rich, Niilas is occupied with Lili and with fixing the law so that it benefits himself, Raiski is trying to write a novel, Saleva wants to become a poet, Raiski offers a

---

192 “Raskasta, raskasta! Ihmiset inhottavia, elämä kuin tahmea virta. Ja itse olin samanlainen, huomasin lopulta senkin.” (TF 113.)
193 “Runous on roskaa! Vain itse elävää elämää on elämisen arvoista.” (TF 204.) The wording carries an ironic reference to Camus’s Meursault who states the opposite; that everyone knows that life is not worth living: “Mais tout le monde sait que la vie ne vaut pas la peine d’être vécue.” (Camus 1942, 173.) (See also Salin 2002, 143).
194 “Tapahtuu ihme: joku ojentaa kätensä.” (TF 246.)
Pomila and Lili are searching for love and for a connection to another human being.

There are multiple possible ways to interpret the meaning of this haziness, mirroring, and projections between the protagonist and the other characters, and different readers have proposed different kinds of readings. The possible interpretive paths could be divided into: i) “extreme psychological interpretation,” ii) “psychological interpretation,” iii) “metafictional interpretation,” and iv) “intertextual interpretation.” An extreme psychological interpretation would be that the narrator hallucinates or imagines all the other characters in the novel: they do not “exist” in the storyworld at all but only in the narrator’s projections, imagination, or hallucinations. For instance, Matti Vainio reads all the other characters as “part identities” of the protagonist’s dissociated personality:

In fact, the whole novel is a continuous monologue of the protagonist. There are hardly any other actual characters. It seems that almost all the other characters are in one way or another embodiments or variations of the parts and features of the narrator-protagonist’s personality. It may seem that Finckelman [sic], who has multiple personalities, can discuss with Lieutenant Saleva or writer Raiski or businessman Mellonen or with drunk Simpanen, but when we are moving on the higher level of the novel, it is reasonable to assume that he is actually having conversations with his own part identities or with his night-time Finckelman identity [...].

The interpretation is plausible but also very generalizing, as it reduces the characters and events of the “realist” level to the “sur-realist” level: everything in the novel happens inside the narrator-protagonist’s shattering mind. Vainio’s interpretation beautifully illuminates one important aspect of the novel, but to appreciate the complexity of the text, other interpretations are also needed.

Another psychologically motivated interpretation could be that the other characters “exist” in the storyworld and to some extent independently of the narrator-protagonist’s mind but they are colored by his perception, thoughts, emotions, and imagination (either unconsciously or unconsciously). In this view, 196 In this view, none of the other characters would be real in the storyworld. However, I would argue that at least Oskari, Simapanen, Pomila, and Lili exist in the storyworld because we meet them in the preface (Oskari) and epilogue (all four) in which the narrator-protagonist is recovering from his breakdown. One could also argue that Oskari, Pomila, Lili, and Simapanen (who has found faith in the end) are the “good sides” of the protagonist’s dissociated personality and this is why they remain after the “bad” ones, Riitu, Saleva, Niilas and others, have disappeared.

he projects his own experiences on others perhaps even without realizing it, portrays others from his own perspective, and maybe sometimes also deliberately shapes and alters the others as he wishes, modifying his conversations with them to show himself in a better light (I return to this in the following section; see also Salin 2002, 51–53; 181). The uncertainty about the borders between the protagonist and the other characters and the way the narrator imagines and narrates his friends raise questions about the power inherent in narrating—a theme that becomes central when we come to the rape scene and its aftermath.

In a metafictional reading, all the minds of the novel are the same: they are invented by the narrator who is writing his novel, just like he invites Dr. Finckelman inside the story—an interpretation that comes very close to the extreme psychological reading. Such a reading is supported by the many metafictional elements of the text, the hints about writing and composing a novel, and the many allusions and references to other works. It is also true in a very general sense: the characters are all created by Jorma Korpela and brought to life in the imagination of each individual reader. The metafictional reading also reminds us that although the protagonist can easily be read through psychological frames, different approaches are needed and in fact used by readers.

Very close to the metafictional reading (a subtype of it) is the reading of the narrator-protagonist as an intertextual figure who is constructed through references and allusions to other fictional characters. Salin (2002, 96) has called this “intertextual selfhood.” As she writes: “Selfhood, like the novel, is spun out of yarns that are stolen from other novels.”197 This is exactly what happens in Tohtori Finckelman. When read in the intertextual framework, it becomes clear that Korpela’s characters are borrowed from other texts: picaresque novels, nineteenth-century horror fiction, Dostoyevsky’s works, and existentialist novels. The intertextual reading emphasizes the constructedness of the characters and their minds, but, somewhat paradoxically, offers also psychological “depth” to the characters through the histories they share with other fictional characters. For instance, although we do not learn much about Lili, we know a lot about her through her connections to other literary characters (see also Salin 2002, 188–189).

Several researchers have explored the different intertextual references created in Tohtori Finckelman, especially the connections between Korpela’s and Dostoyevsky’s novels, and paid attention to the way Korpela brings the Dostoyevskian theme of doubles inside the storyworld he constructs and even inside individual characters.198 For example, Annamari Sarajas (1953/1980, 59–61) suggests that Korpela stages a struggle between the two Karamazov brothers, Ivan and Alyosha (Brothers Karamazov 1880), inside the narrator-protagonist’s mind: he is a character who is internally divided into cruel rationality and loving compassion. The narrator-protagonist and Lili can also be read as reinterpretations of Liza and the narrator of Tales from the Underground (1864): both novels share the narrator’s unreliability, problems of communication, and the way the protagonist clearly loves the woman but pushes her away. Moreover, Sari Salin (2002, 189–190) sees parallels between Lili and Sonja (Crime and Punishment, 1866) and especially between Lili and Nastasya Filippovna (The Idiot, 1869) (see also Vainio 1975, 48; Karhu 1977, 118). “The apostle of love” of Tohtori Finckelman, Master Pomila/Reverend Pomilov is often seen as Father Zosima from Brothers Karamazov or as Prince Myshkin from The Idiot (see Sarajas 1953/1980, 57; Vainio 1975, 89; Karhu 1977, 118; Envall 1988, 114; Salin 2002, 255).

197 “Minuus, aivan kuten romaanikin, rakentuu siis muista romaaneista varastetuista kuteista.” (Salin 2002, 96.)

Furthermore, the themes of the self and the other, the protagonist’s alienation and solipsism, and the motif of the “other world” connect Tohtori Finckelman directly to Dostoyevsky’s “Menippean” short story “The Dream of a Ridiculous Man” (1877) in which the narrator goes through extreme experiences of solipsism (see also Salin 2002, 138–140):

I may almost say that the world now seemed created for me alone: if I shot myself the world would cease to be at least for me. I say nothing of its being likely that nothing will exist for anyone when I am gone, and that as soon as my consciousness is extinguished the whole world will vanish too and become void like a phantom, as a mere appurtenance of my consciousness, for possibly all this world and all these people are only me myself. (Dostoyevsky 2012, 231.)

Dostoyevsky’s narrator dreams of killing himself, but at the same time suspects that if he died, perhaps all the other people in the world would disappear too. In a way, the connection between the Ridiculous Man and the narrator-protagonist of Tohtori Finckelman brings together the different interpretive frames: psychological and metafictional. Both texts rely heavily on the previous literary tradition, while at the same time revealing something psychologically insightful about experiences of extreme solipsism and alienation.

In addition to the Dostoyevskian characters, motifs and themes, the dividedness between the narrator and “Dr. Finckelman” can be read as a direct reference to Stevenson’s Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, as well as to other “mad scientists” like Mary Shelley’s Frankenstein or Hjalmar Söderberg’s Doktor Glas. The protagonist’s profession, the wealth he gains, as well as Riitu’s hints about “the mountain” and ore under the ground create a connection to Goethe’s Faust and to Mann’s Doktor Faustus. Furthermore, the protagonist and his farmhand Oskari form a carnivalesque pair that resembles Don Quixote and Sancho Panza (see also Salin 2002, 88; 99–104). The narrator-protagonist himself connects Lili to Joan of Arc. To mention one more allusion, the party in Chapter 25 at Mellonen’s club could be read as a parody of Plato’s Symposium. Reading closely, it becomes apparent that Korpela has hidden a large part of Western literary history inside his novel.

Out of all the cultural, literary, and philosophical references of Tohtori Finckelman, especially important are the connections to Dostoyevsky and Nietzsche. Chapter 26, after the “symposium,” depicts the most significant, and the most devastating encounter between Lili and the protagonist. The narrator calls it the “fatal chapter”: in it, everything goes wrong and any kind of meaningful connection between Lili and the protagonist proves to be impossible. She has invited the protagonist to meet her at her home, and before the meeting he is filled with conflicted emotions: he walks in the forest, his moods are changing, his feet feel heavy like they often do in such instances, and there is a strange atmosphere. He calls Lili “a whore” in his mind and laments that “You should remain a saint…” He seems to be feeling anxiety because of the emotions she raises in him and finally decides that he will not go to the meeting at all. This decision is of course negated immediately and on his way to Lili’s home an overwhelming feeling of warmth and joy overcomes him: “My eyes, radiate joy…”

At Lili’s place, the dynamics of their conversation is strange from the start. Both act distant and indifferent and neither say what they feel or even why they are meeting. Finally, the protagonist blurts out that he is “Finckelman” and there to “discuss” Lili’s “illness” and that he is “Lili’s helper.” Lili becomes furious:

– Do you think that I need your help! She threw [the words] in my face in a way that would have shocked any man. Except me. Because I did not exist really, there was another man, a robot, a machine, that was able to speak whatever came to his mind, but in a consistent manner, which indeed is strange.

– Luuletteko että olen apuanne vaivainen! Hän sinkautti vasten kasvojani niin että siinä olisi hätähtänyt mies kuin mies. Paitai minä. Sillä minua ei siinä oikeastaan ollutkaan, oli toinen mies, robotti, kone, joka saattoi puhua aivan mitä sattuu, mutta kuitenkin johdonmukaisesti, merkillistä kyllä. (TF 253.)

We get an image of the protagonist who has become a machine, a robot. The narrator is hinting that he is not himself (he seems to be somehow possessed: speaking “whatever came to his mind”). Lili continues her attack: “I despise

---

199 In fact, the protagonist often acts like Socrates in his conversations with the other characters: he pretends ignorant in order to make other people reveal their thoughts—and their ignorance. See also Salin (2002, 29) on the “Socratic irony” in the background of Korpela’s works.

200 “Pysyisit pyhimyksenä…” (TF 251.)

201 “Silmäni, säteiltää onnea…” (TF 253.)
people who try to help, she continued, I don’t need your pity.”202 When Lili ends her monologue, it is the protagonist’s turn: whatever Lili has said, he now says the opposite. He gives an elaborate speech about looking from a position that is so high above the ground that nothing matters anymore:

– You are completely mistaken. It is not a question of pity [...] you must rise high enough and look from there, see things in their right proportions, in the ultimately right. How do you see then? Everything looks very small, nothing is worth pitying anymore. There is no more suffering, no more hate or love, because you won’t see it anymore. You will continue your way with a cheerful mind...

– Te eredytte täydellisesti. Ei ole kyse säälistä [...] teidän on noustava kyltin korkealle ja katseltava sieltä, nähtävä asiat oikeissa mittasuhteissaan, lopullisesti oikeissa. Miten siis näette? Kaikki näyttää hyvin pieneltä silloin, mikään ei ole säälin arvoista enää. Ei ole enää kärkimystä, ei vihaa eikä rakkautta, koska te ette sitä enää näe. Te jatkatte matkaa iloisin mielin...

(TF 255–256.)

We learn the moral code the protagonist is adopting. Again, there are several directions for interpretation. The speech can be read as a manifestation of the cold philosophy the protagonist has actually developed, or it can be read as an act in which the protagonist takes up the “mask” of Dr. Finckelman to hide his true feelings, or we can interpret that the protagonist is somehow in the “possession” of Dr. Finckelman.203 The narrator once again suggests that the words are not actually his; that they just came from somewhere: “Some unknown force put the words in my mouth and I let them out, this is the only way I can explain it.”204 This is true: the words come from Nietzsche, and Korpela makes the protagonist say them.205 However, the protagonist’s ideas about ethics are met with shock by Lili:

– Are you insane? She asked.
– I am. However you want. Don’t you understand? I am Finckelman…
– That is exactly what you are.

202 “– Halveksin auttajia, hän jatkoi, en tarvitse sääliänne.” (TF 254.)
203 The interpretation that the protagonist is “possessed” has two directions: either it refers to the symptoms of the dissociative disorder or to some kind of mystical power. See also Salin (2002, 68–78) on the way the protagonist hides behind the “mask” of the doctor and of Dr. Finckelman. The “mask” is explicitly mentioned at the very end of Part Two: Oskari has arrived at the hospital to help the protagonist who is going insane, and the protagonist keeps asking Oskari: “Listen, could you get me another mask?” (“Kuule, voitko hankkia minulle toisen naamarin?”) (TF 331.)
204 “Jokin tuntematon voima pani sanat suuhuni ja minä laskitin ne ulos, muulla tavoin en osaa asiaa selittää.” (TF 257.)
205 See Salin (2002, 126–129) for a more detailed discussion on the connection to Nietzsche. She also points out that Korpela seems to interpret Nietzsche through Dostoyevsky and as a result, his view of Nietzschean ethics is mostly negative (ibid., 123).
Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation

– Oletteko te hullu, hän kysyi.
– Olen, miten vain haluatte. Ettekö ymmärrä? Olen Finckelman…
– Se te juuri olette. (TF 257.)

From Lili’s perspective, it is “insane” and immoral, to think that the solution would be to distance oneself from others, to put oneself above everyone else. This kind of thinking is destructive.

A few chapters later Lili tries once more to find a connection to the protagonist. In this meeting, Lili is able to be open about her own emotions: she tells him that she feels closeness to him and that when they met, she felt that she could have even been “naked without being ashamed.” To this the protagonist replies: “Naked, you said. Good! It’s just that there is so much available these days…” Once again, there are at least two directions for interpretation. The protagonist’s cold, misogynous words are meant to hide his feelings. At the same time, their relationship repeats the communication problems between the Underground Man and Liza in Dostoyevsky’s novel. After the protagonist has rejected Lili, she marries Niilas. The last conversation between Lili and the protagonist (before the epilogue in which Lili returns) is at the wedding in which the protagonist is the witness. Lili is wearing black, not smiling, her “eyes are hollow” and she only replies shortly to the protagonist’s congratulations: “Thank you for everything, doctor Finckelman.” The same night, we learn later, she shoots Niilas and goes insane.

Ultimately the narrator-protagonist’s “symptoms” discussed throughout this chapter can also be read through the intertexts rather than the psychological or pathological frames of reading: the protagonist is an “abject hero,” an “outsider,” as readers of Korpela noted early (Kare 1952/1996, 362; Vainio 1975, 102–105; 173). He suffers like Dostoyevsky’s Underground Man or Camus’ Meursault do: from self-hate, loathing, and contempt, and from being an outsider, not fitting inside social norms, not being able to behave as one is expected to (see Bernstein 1992, 89–90; Wilson 1958; Salin 2002, 143; 163). However, Bernstein (1992, 99) also emphasizes the difference between abject heroes and outsiders. According to him, Dostoyevskian abject heroes are quite different from the outsider figures of existentialist literature: “Dostoyevsky is as powerful an anti-existentialist writer as we have, anticipating with contempt most of the standard moves of subsequent existentialist writers. Unlike novelists like Camus, for example, Dostoyevsky refuses the notion that lucidity about one’s condition suffices to make one a tragic figure.” Salin (2002, 96), following Bernstein, notes that abject heroes are “inauthentic” and “late”: they are mere incarnations of literary clichés or “types,” “lacking authenticity even in their suffering, where they most need to feel original.” (See Bernstein 1992, 22; 104; 106.) This “fictitiousness” and lack of authenticity contrasts (at least to some extent) with the psychological lifelikeness of the strangers and

---

206 “[V]oisin riisuutua hetipaikalla alasti enkä tuntisi häpeää…” (TF 288.)
207 “Vaikka alasti, sanoitte. Hyvä! Nykyisin on vain niin paljon tarjolla…” (TF 288.)
208 “[K]iitos kaikesta, tohtori Finckelman” (TF 302).
209 However, Bernstein (1992, 99) also emphasizes the difference between abject heroes and outsiders. According to him, Dostoyevskian abject heroes are quite different from the outsider figures of existentialist literature: “Dostoyevsky is as powerful an anti-existentialist writer as we have, anticipating with contempt most of the standard moves of subsequent existentialist writers. Unlike novelists like Camus, for example, Dostoyevsky refuses the notion that lucidity about one’s condition suffices to make one a tragic figure.” Salin (2002, 96), following Bernstein, notes that abject heroes are “inauthentic” and “late”: they are mere incarnations of literary clichés or “types,” “lacking authenticity even in their suffering, where they most need to feel original.” (See Bernstein 1992, 22; 104; 106.) This “fictitiousness” and lack of authenticity contrasts (at least to some extent) with the psychological lifelikeness of the strangers and has strong connections to Menippean satire: his experiences of loss of time, loss of consciousness, and loss of memory are not just psychological symptoms (of for example dissociation), but also some of the core features of the Menippean, carnivalesque genre. In other words, the protagonist’s “symptoms” are highly literary and fictional as well as psychological and lifelike.
Fictions of Madness

The fictional minds Korpela constructs cannot thus be read solely through psychological models: Tohtori Finckelman invites readers to make such interpretations (after all, the protagonist is a psychiatrist), but also offers multiple paths for readings that take into consideration the intertextual elements of the novel and the play with the literary and cultural traditions and generic conventions. Ironically, at the same time the narrator-protagonist suffers from his own feeling of artificiality and identifies himself with an invented figure, Dr. Finckelman. He makes questions of the similarities or differences between real and fictional people ironic by bringing to the fore the constructedness of fictional minds and also by reminding how actual people fictionalize and narrativize themselves. Salin notes that in the early critiques of Tohtori Finckelman the intertextual construction of Korpela’s characters was often missed, and as a result Korpela was accused of making his characters flat or unrealistic (Salin 2002, 64). Yet, some readers also emphasized the lifelikeness of the characters, as we have seen. Ultimately the text invites a reading that maintains both perspectives: the characters are simultaneously “imagined in flesh and blood,” as Holappa (1952/1996, 359) wrote, and artificial, intertextual constructions.

Empathy and Estrangement

At night I wake up. I startle.
What have I done, I say at once to the darkness that surrounds me. What have I said to her [Lili]? I ask. Was I in my right mind? I was not going to speak like that, I was supposed to speak in another way. In completely another...

Yöllä herään. Hätkähän.

As discussed, the protagonist’s thoughts about the artificiality and machine-like quality of his life, as well as the way he denies his feelings and takes up the “mask” of Dr. Finckelman, are unsettling from a psychological perspective. At outsiders of existentialism. It seems that Korpela’s characters are somewhere in between Dostoyevsky and Camus: feeling alienated, suffering, lacking authenticity, and suffering even more.

the same time, the narrator is likely to invite empathy in readers when he reveals to us the sides of himself that he hides from the other characters and even from himself.\textsuperscript{210} After both of his disastrous encounters with Lili (the fatal chapter and the last encounter before the wedding), he deeply regrets his words, asks Lili for forgiveness in his mind, and hopes that she will be alright. He also makes direct confessions to his readers, for example when reporting one of his discussions with businessman Mellonen: “I have never acted, I said although I had. My whole life.”\textsuperscript{211} An image of deep suffering and disconnection both from oneself and from others has emerged. The feelings of acting and estrangement are not so uncommon—anyone has these traits—but if we interpret that the protagonist suffers from schizoid personality or dissociation, he is in danger of developing a full-blown psychosis.

As the story evolves, the protagonist comes to a situation where the borders between the actual world and his imaginary-hallucinatory world collapse, and the latter takes over—something that Sass (1994, 300) has called “World Catastrophe” (the self and the world become indistinguishable; the self is distorted, and the world is mutating or evaporating) and readers of Tohtori Finckelman have called the “sur-realist” level of the text (Sarajas 1953/1980, 61; Vainio 1975, 192–196). The protagonist is split between the “miserable man” of the subtitle who “carries the burden of whole humanity on his shoulders”\textsuperscript{212} and the cruel Dr. Finckelman who is free from all moral constraints and responsibility for others and who lacks humanity. This is what led for example Annamari Sarajas (1953/1980, 70) to write that the storyworld is depicted “from the perspective of a non-human,”\textsuperscript{213} suggesting that the narrator, at the moment of writing, is Dr. Finckelman. However, the narrative situation is more complex: at the time of writing his story, it seems that the narrator is recovering from the breakdown that is caused by him becoming Dr. Finckelman. From a metafictional point of view, the novel can be read as an exploration of the borders between the real and the imaginary, life and fiction. Like the psychological, also the metafictional and intertextual elements can invite empathy, since they remind us of the fictionality of the text and create a safe space (see also Keen 2007, 98). But when we come to the crime at the heart of the novel, the rape of Reseda, we are compelled to take a moral stance and start making decisions about how to interpret the narrator and the story he recounts (also Salin 2002, 220).

I discuss the rape scene and the world of imagination/hallucination (the “real world,” as the narrator starts to call it) after the following section. Before that, let us take a closer look at the narrator’s unreliability and the distance and estrangement the protagonist’s behavior is likely to invite in readers. As I have argued, reading the protagonist as a distressed character who is going through a mental breakdown is likely to invite empathy in readers. This would be a result of what Phelan (2007, 223–224) has called “bonding unreliability”: if we read the narrator as unreliable because he is suffering from mental distress, trauma, and loss of connection to other people, such unreliability reduces the distance between the narrator and the readers. The narrator’s ironies, self-contradictions and overstatements—even bragging—can also invite an empathetic reading as they constantly reveal what they are supposed to hide and thus diminish the distance between the narrator and the readers. Further, because of the aesthetic frame (because we know that the story is fiction), readers are likely to accept the protagonist’s moral transgressions (for example his malicious talk to Lili) more easily than they would in real life. However, the hints that the narrator is purposely unreliable, and trying to hide his immoral actions, especially the fact that he has raped someone, are likely to make readers distance themselves from him. This is what Phelan (2007, 223–224) has called “distancing unreliability”: unreliable narration that underlines or increases the distance between the narrator and the readers.

The constant oscillation between bonding and distancing unreliability, as well as the uncertainty whether the narrator-protagonist is “fallible” or “untrustworthy” in Greta Olson’s (2003, 96) terms—whether he is unreliable because of his circumstances or his dispositions—creates a serious problem for the readers. As we saw in the analysis of Kaunis sielu, when a first-person narrator’s hallucinatory, psychotic, or imaginary experiential world takes over the storyworld, questions about the narrator’s reliability become difficult: hallucinations and delusions make these questions futile, because in such a state—where the signposts of the storyworld disappear—it becomes impossible to distinguish between what is “true” or “false,” what actually happens in the storyworld and what is invented or hallucinated by the narrator. In such cases it is impossible to decide whether the narrator-protagonist is guilty of the crimes he or she narrates. However, in Tohtori Finckelman, even before the protagonist’s delusional or psychotic episodes and “becoming of flesh of Dr. Finckelman,” there are instances in which the narrator can be interpreted as intentionally unreliable: not 214 Salin (2002, 159) suggests also the opposite: that the “mental disorder” of the protagonist creates estrangement. However, she emphasizes that the main reason why readers might not feel sympathy for the narrator-protagonist is because his “confession” is ironic: he is unable to confess his crimes, leaving readers to make their own interpretations.

---

just fallible because he is on the verge of psychosis or dissociation, but untrustworthy and deliberately deceiving his readers. In such instances, the author can be said to be communicating to readers as if “behind the narrator’s back” and encouraging us to distance ourselves from the narrator (see also Booth 1983; Phelan 2005). The following section focuses on such warnings.

3.3. Mad or Bad? Distancing Ourselves

As we have seen, the unreliability of the narrator of Tohtori Finckelman raises both psychological and ethical questions: Is the narrator “mad” or “bad”? Is he fallible (like the narrator of Kaunis sielu) or untrustworthy? The text does not give readers any definite answers to these questions, and even some of the events in the story remain uncertain. To be able to decide what is real and what is invented, imagined, or hallucinated by the narrator-protagonist, the readers would need to find out whether his unreliability is a result of mental distress or whether he is deliberately lying and deceiving his audience. Particularly the interpretation of the main events is tied to the readers’ ways of following the movements of the narrator-protagonist’s mind: “attributing” mental states to him, as cognitive narratologists would put it (e.g., Palmer 2009, 292–293). If we could correctly “diagnose” the narrator-protagonist’s mind and actions, we could make a judgment about his role in Reseda’s rape. However, the novel constantly prevents us from making such psychologizing and pathologizing interpretations. Instead, it shows that diagnosing and labeling people—whether they are fictional or real—is a problematic endeavor (see also Salin 1996, xi–xii).

The way the narrator’s relationship with women is portrayed has important consequences for reading and interpreting the novel and its main events. The narrator is most often contradictory, shady and shifty when it comes to women, and when read closely, he appears to be a highly misogynous character. As we have seen, women are depicted as a source of meaning in the narrator-protagonist’s life, but as he fails in his efforts to communicate and create relationships with women, he also starts to despise them. Or to be more precise, there is an element of misogyny all along in the way the protagonist participates in the talk of the men close to him. As Salin (2002, 191) has pointed out, only two types of women seem to fit inside the protagonist’s worldview: saints and prostitutes. Apart from this dualist role, women are “others” that have no characteristics of their own and that seem to be mainly mirrors on which the protagonist reflects himself.

As discussed, Part One recounts the story about the inheritance: on a concrete level, it is a story about inheriting the farm and, on a more allegorical level, about inheriting (the story of) Dr. Finckelman from Riitu. But when looking closely at the events of Part One and the way they are motivated, it becomes clear that they are mostly about the protagonist’s love affairs: he is a young man who is desperate to get the attention of women but fails in his efforts and often makes a fool of himself (although the narrator, who is mostly taking the perspective of the experiencing I, never clearly admits this to his audience or himself). Practically all the ethical problems the novel raises are underscored in how the male characters relate to the women: in repeated insults, physical intrusion and violence, and hints of abuse. It is not a coincidence that the most important and most distressing event of the novel, and a question that remains without an answer, involves a rape. Like murder, rape is an extreme violation of another human being, and it makes visible most violent relations of power, especially between the genders (see also Salin 2002, 216; 220). This is also why a closer analysis of the narrator’s (un)reliability when he depicts his relationships with women can shed light on the most difficult ethical questions of the novel.

James Phelan’s (2005; 2007) distinctions between different types of unreliability are helpful when analyzing the narrator of Tohtori Finckelman. He has distinguished between mis- or underreporting, which involves the ways a narrator represents facts and events; mis- or underreading (or mis- or underinterpreting) which concerns a narrator’s understanding and perception of facts and events; and mis- or underevaluating (or mis- or underregarding) which concerns the values of a narrator. For example, narrators are misreporting when they portray facts and events falsely and underreporting when they tell too little; misinterpreting when they interpret or understand the things they narrate falsely (for example because they are young or incapacitated); and, finally, miseducating when their values are inconsistent with what is generally held as ethical or unethical. An important question concerning the apparent misogyny in Tohtori Finckelman is: is the narrator misinterpreting or miseducating some of the events because he was young, naïve, or mentally distressed at the time of the events, or is he misrepresenting them on purpose at the time of writing, in order to deceive his audience?

The way we interpret the narrator-protagonist and the events he narrates is partly dependent on this distinction—and this is also one of the reasons why readers of Tohtori Finckelman may interpret the events of the novel very differently, and why our evaluation of the narrator may also easily change from one reading to another. Tohtori Finckelman thus highlights Ansgar Nünning’s (1997; 1999; 2008) and Vera Nünning’s (2004) insights on unreliability: it very much depends on readers’ interpretive choices and values.215 The earliest readers 215 As Vera Nünning (1998/2004) has shown, readers’ understanding and perception of unreliability of a specific narrator can change from one historical and social context to another: a narrator who is understood as reliable by one generation of readers may appear as unreliable for another, as the context and readers’ worldviews and moral norms change. of Tohtori Finckelman emphasized the nihilism and coldness of the protagonist’s worldview and the problems in his morals (e.g., Havu 1952/1996; Kare 1952/1996; Koskimies 1952/1996; on the protagonist’s nihilism, see Salin 2002, 113–116). Yet the misogynous elements of the novel started to become noticed almost half a century later (see Salin 1996; 2002). However, this does not mean that Korpela constructed the narrator-protagonist’s views of women by accident: I argue that the narrator’s misogyny is a carefully composed authorial strategy, and its purpose is to criticize what today are understood as toxic forms of masculinity. It is tightly connected with Korpela’s criticism of violence and the abuse of different forms of institutional and structural power.216

---

Underreporting or Misinterpreting?

Many of the protagonist’s encounters with women seem at first glance like depictions of common failures in romantic relations and clumsy attempts to cover them. For example, when he has fallen in love (as the readers can infer) with the maid of the farm, Marke and notices that Marke goes to sleep in the granary, the narrator, adapting to his younger self’s position as he often does, rushes to state that: “I paid absolutely no attention to the whole thing…”217 The narrator takes the perspective of the experiencing I, and the hyperbolic denial suggests that he is consciously underreporting his past thoughts: trying to hide how interested he was in Marke (although he does not do a very good job at this). There are also discrepancies between what the narrator says and what has likely happened. He continues about Marke a bit later: “That night I went to Marke’s granary. She had asked me with her eyes in the evening, you see.”218 On a quick reading, this early statement seems quite innocent and might be missed by a hasty reader: perhaps the young protagonist really believed that Marke invited him “with her eyes,” thus misinterpreting the situation—or we might even trust his interpretation and think that Marke actually did “invite” him “with her eyes.” But when read in the light of the whole novel, the short remark gains more significance: it could be read as the narrator’s self-defense, and the comment addressed to the readers (“you see”) could be read as an attempt to make us agree with him. Is the narrator trying to get away from his actions by relying

---

216 E.g., Vainio (1975, 65) remarks the depictions of women as “prostitutes” but suggests that Korpela (not the narrator) treats the female characters “rudely” (“töykeästi”), not paying attention to the narrator’s unreliability or to the critical function of the representations. Salin (1996, xi; 2002, 191), however, notes that the labeling of women is ironic: a way to criticize the roles and stereotypes of masculinity. See also Olson (2018) on the political uses of unreliability and unreliability as a form of ideological critique.

217 “En kiinnittänyt vähintäkään huomiota koko asiaan…” (TF 16.)

218 “Sinä yönä menin Marken aittaan, hän oli näet illalla sitä silmillään pyyntänyt.” (TF 16.)
on a victim-blaming discourse? What is the relationship between the experiencing I (the young protagonist) and the narrator in such passages?

As we have already seen, these misogynous discourses are not only used by the narrator-protagonist but also by the other men he spends time with as a young man. A few chapters later Simpanen (the other vagabond) makes a very similar comment about Marke: “And that girl is very generous in that thing, I have noticed. One can see it from the eyes and from the way a girl walks.” Simpanen begins with a comment about Marke, and then makes a general “educational” remark about women, addressed to the young protagonist. It is noteworthy that Simpanen’s misogynous comments are presented after the protagonist has sex with Marke. Because of the careful composition of the novel, there is reason to think that they are meant to be interrelated. This raises several questions: Does the protagonist “learn” the words from Simpanen, and then use them in his story regarding the earlier event? Or does the narrator put these words into Simpanen’s mouth to justify his own actions (consciously or unconsciously)? The connections between the characters’ talk also support the interpretation that all of them are different “sides” of the protagonist (this interpretation can have a psychological meaning, “dissociated personality,” or a meta-fictional one, other characters as the protagonist’s “doubles,” as discussed). One thing is certain: the implied author is giving us hints that the discourse about women “inviting men with their eyes” is generally used by men and should be regarded with suspicion.

After the narrator has implied that he had sex with Marke, he tells us that she left the farm with Hoikkanen and we are shown how the protagonist directs his attention (again) to the police chief’s daughter. He encounters her at the church dance but does not dare to speak to her. Later, he makes elaborate plans about what he would say if they met:

But let me say, in my humble opinion, that life is not just a dance, unfortunately, excuse me. It is not, for life, real life, is something completely different. It is a heavy burden and a battle. It is contemplation and deep thoughts. It is loneliness and longing, a walk in the courts of death. Life is death...

Mutta sallikaa minun kuitenkin lausua omana vaatimattomana mielipiteeniäni, että elämä ei ole pelkkää tanssimista, valitettavasti, anteeksi vaan. Ei ole, sillä elämä, tosi elämä on aivan muuta. Se on raskasta kuormaa ja taistelua. Se on miettelyä, syviä ajatuksia. Se on yksinäisyyttä ja kaipuuta, käyskentelyä kuoleman esikartanoissa. Elämä on kuolemaa... (TF 85.)

The speech is at once comical in all of its pompousness and clichéd metaphors (“life is not a dance”), but also reveals the protagonist’s melancholy thoughts

219 “Ja tuo tyttö on hyvin avulias siinä asiassa, minä olen merkinnyt. Silmistä sen huomaa ja käyntitavasta.” (TF 68.)
(“loneliness and longing”; “life is death…”). However, he never gets to give his speech to the daughter: an even clearer misinterpretation, or rather an overinterpretation of the events than with Marke happens when the young man runs into the girl and finally tries to have a conversation with her. He meets her by the road, is unable to form complete sentences, forgets his plans, and completely loses his composure, which results in bitter thoughts: “She was smiling. It was a devilish smile, I could see.” 220 The interpretation appears almost paranoid: there is no reason to think that the girl’s smile is “devilish” (he repeats this several times), or that she would be mocking the protagonist—in fact she does not get a chance to say anything, because the young man rushes away ashamed. Especially his following reaction is out of proportion in relation to the situation at hand: “You Satan’s bitch! I said. God damn it! A whore is a whore…” 221

At this point, readers may still discard the insults or explain them away: the young man interprets the girl’s smile as a mockery and is trying to alleviate his own embarrassment. But in the light of the rest of the novel one could read this as a first instance in which the protagonist has fully adopted a misogynous attitude to women. One could of course claim that the words are not his own but borrowed from Simpanen and Riitu who has earlier explicitly called the police chief’s daughter a “whore” (TF 27). The protagonist seems to be echoing Riitu’s words. In any case, they make explicit the protagonist’s misogynous thoughts. In passages like this, Korpela moves carefully between the psychology of an insecure young man and misogynous thinking. There are again two directions for interpretation: one in which the young protagonist’s behavior is understood, to some extent, as a young man’s angry and embarrassed response, and another in which his actions are seen as first instances of abusive behavior—and it is left for the reader to choose between these interpretive paths.

Another incident in Part One sheds further light on the protagonist’s way of thinking and gains more significance later. Marke has now left the farm, and when she returns with Hoikkanen and a man called Jammu, the protagonist seems to yet again misinterpret what happens—and again the narrator stays firmly in the background:

They [Marke and Jammu] were looking around, at the sauna, inside the stables and the cow house. And especially the granary where Marke had lived, they looked for a long time and thoroughly, they even locked the door. And when they came out, Marke blossomed even more than usually.

He [Marke ja Jammu] katselivat yhtä ja toista paikkaa, saunaa ja tallia ja navettaa. Ja varsinkin sitä aittaa, missä Marke oli meillä asunut, he tarkastelivat pitkään ja perusteellisesti, panivatpa ovenkin säppiin. Tullessaan ulos Marke oli entistä kukoistavampi. (TF 95.)

220 “Hän hymyili, se oli pirullista hymyää, minä näin.” (TF 87.)
221 “Saatanan letukka! sanoin. Jumalauta! Huora mikä huora…” (TF 87.)
The event is described once again from the perspective of the experiencing I (the young protagonist) and the readers are guided to believe that he is naïve and misinterprets the situation. But there is also an impression of intentionality: the ironic tone suggests that the narrator does understand what happens and actually only pretends when he is reporting it with exaggerated naiveté. There is a curious mixture of more or less conscious underreporting (on the narrator’s part) and more or less unconscious misinterpretation (on the protagonist’s part) which once again leads the readers toward two different interpretive paths. This structure in which the experiencing I appears to be misinterpreting what is happening and the narrator stays seemingly invisible but is responsible for the irony (and is clearly underreporting) is common throughout the whole novel.

Part Two begins, as discussed, with the protagonist’s complaints about the “half-heartedness” of his life. He does not make it explicit, but he seems to be looking for love and is disappointed in his life and lonely (we may recall the protagonist’s musings about the actress or “Holy Virgin” who took away “the meaning of his life”). In the chapter where he meets Miss Lilian for the first time, the narrator does hint that something important is about to happen, as we can recall: “This chapter must definitely be read.” 222 But when it comes to describing the encounter with Lili, he, as usual, negates his thoughts and emotions right after expressing them (see also Salin 2002, 155):

You can’t judge a book by its cover... That is what I thought when I first saw her. Mistake! She was beautiful also from the inside, as I realized later. And besides: she was not actually beautiful at all, though not ugly either...

Moni on kakku päältä kaunis... Noin ajattelin hänet nähdessäni ensi kerta. Erehdys! Hän oli kaunis sisältäkin, kuten tulin myöhemmin huomamaan. Ja sitä paitsi: ei hän päältäpäin kaunis ollutkaan, jos nyt ei ruma-kaan... (TF 123.)

The depiction of Lili’s beauty is instantly negated by the logic of proposition-negation. The same passage is also a demonstration of what Salin (2002, 15) describes as the anti-realistic tendencies of the novel: there is hardly any description, of either places or characters. The reader gets very little information about Lili—of what she looks like, who she is, what her history is—only about the narrator’s reflections. Right after telling us about the encounter with Lili the narrator also admits, and instantly denies, the effect she has on him. First, he claims that he has forgotten her, then immediately contradicts the statement by admitting that he thinks about her, and finally downplays the whole thing—while still leaving a melancholic thought in the air:

All right. Enough about her. I forgot about her. Only sometimes she came to my mind. How is Miss Lilian doing, I thought. […] But that’s what I thought about many patients of mine. For a person thinks this and that. And in time, the thoughts pass.

222 “Tämä luku on ehdottomasti luettava.” (TF 122.)

There is an invitation to a romantic, psychological interpretation, with sympathy for the protagonist: he has failed so many times in his love affairs that he cannot allow himself to hope for anything. Especially the last sentence, “in time the thoughts pass,” reveals that he does have deeper feelings. There is a constant discrepancy between what the protagonist says and feels: even though the narrator does not admit it directly, the whole novel, after first meeting Miss Lilian, is about her—as he hints in Chapter 17: “My novel begins...” (See also Salin 2002, 62.)

To sum up the discussion so far: the protagonist constantly misinterprets the events and other people’s intentions, and the narrator often under- or misreports his past thoughts and feelings. The narrator could be interpreted as hiding things not just from his audience, but also from himself: his use of irony and constant denials and negations could be read through a psychoanalytical frame as effects of repression, as moments in which his unconscious thoughts and hopes are revealed in the writing process without his knowledge. This invites readers to sympathize with the protagonist to some extent: especially after reading about the first encounters with Lili it might be tempting to interpret him as a person who is out of touch with his own emotions and experiences, and suffering from an inability to connect with other people. He is looking for love, but always fails and resorts to compensatory behaviors: denying his emotions, bragging, and accusing others. He could also be read in the intertextual frame of an abject hero, speaking and behaving as many other characters have behaved before him (see Bernstein 1992, 104).

Slips of the Tongue and Strange Hints

As the story continues, readers encounter more and more situations which show the protagonist in a misogynous light, and the suspicions against him mounts also regarding the rape. As said, in order to make a judgement about the most critical events, the reader would need to “diagnose” the protagonist as suffering from a schizoid or dissociated personality, and this would explain why the narrator is unable to tell his readers what actually happens, or decide that he develops into a misogynous rapist who is deceiving his audience on purpose. So what kind of a Bildungsroman is Tohtori Finckelman? What does he become? Some answers to this can found in the narrator’s slips of the tongue and the strange hints he makes.

---

223 “Romaanini alkaa...” (TF 123.)

Let us now turn to the events just before and after the rape in Part Two. If we read the text carefully, we see that the narrator has left things out of the story which are revealed by other characters. For example Raiski suddenly questions the protagonist about a woman he apparently has an affair with:

– Listen, why didn’t you bring the woman with you?
– Who?
– The nurse.
– Well, I didn’t happen to bring her, I sneered; he was talking about a nurse who sometimes visited me.

– Kuule, miksi et sinä tuonut naista mukanasi?
– Ketä?
– Sitä hoitajatarta.
– En sattunut tuomaan, hymähdin; hän tarkoitti erästä hoitajatarta, joka joskus kävi luonani. (TF 171.)

The reader finds out “by chance”—through another character—that the protagonist actually has some kind of a relationship with a nurse from the hospital. This is an important nugget of information because it proves part of the accusations the protagonist faces later from Saleva about sleeping with nurses and patients. The whole passage is also a kind of slip of the tongue: it would be more beneficial for the narrator to leave his readers completely unaware of the nurse, although it is not possible to infer anything else from this affair because we never hear more about it.224

A similar, even more revealing, incident occurs when the narrator recounts how he and his friends encountered Marke in the city, and Marke gets to speak for the second time in the whole novel (the first is in Part One where the protagonist accuses Marke of stealing from him and she gets angry, as she is here):

– Damn it, you’re saying you don’t remember me! Marke started to drawl with her cold harlot voice. She was drunk.
– Here he is, the man, the so-called doctor, who first made me a whore.

– Ja perkele, etkö muka muista! Marke alkoi lasketella kolealla portonäällä. Hän oli humalassa.
– Tässä se nyt on se mies, se tohtori muka, joka minusta ensimmäisenä huoran teki. (TF 233.)

224 See also Phelan (2005, 12) on “redundant telling” through which authors communicate to readers indirectly, and Salin (2002, 58–59) on “unnecessary or redundant denials” which are a recurrent technique in Korpela’s novels: e.g., the protagonist and Riitu constantly deny different things (their thoughts, emotions, acts of violence) without reason, thus revealing them.
Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation

Marke’s words paint the previous events in a very different light. But again, her “outburst” (as the narrator makes it look) could be interpreted in several possible ways and explained away: the narrator emphasizes her drunkenness, she could be overreacting because the narrator does not recognize her at first, or she could be angry at the narrator because of something else that has happened in the past. A very susceptible sympathetic reader might even think that perhaps she has been in love with the protagonist all along, consensual in their relationship, hurt, and chosen to leave with Hoikkanen and Jammu only because the protagonist rejects her (for the police chief’s daughter). Readers are left to choose a side: Marke’s or the protagonist’s. The problem is—as usual—that everything we know about Marke is filtered through and controlled by the narrator. For example, describing her “harlot voice” is the narrator’s way to influence the readers’ image of her. But once again, intertextual interpretation could support Marke’s point of view. Her fate is aligned with Nastasya Filippovna’s (Dostoyevsky’s The Idiot, 1868) who is abused by Totsky as a young woman and who later accuses him, much like Marke does in the passage.

As aggravating as the protagonist’s encounters with women are, especially when presented out of their larger context as I have done above, we hardly ever encounter him doing anything abusive or criminal: we do not see him abusing or even mistreating Marke, only vague hints and suspicions. Annamari Sarajas has suggested that the protagonist often manipulates the people around him rather than acting himself (like Ivan in Brothers Karamazov): “the devilish threads of his thoughts—not his actions—tie all the people around him to the same condemnation.” Even though there is no conclusive “evidence,” a clear picture of how the protagonist sees women emerges from these events, short comments and hints: for him they are whores (or thieves) if they do not subject to men’s will. This picture is shared by all the men in the novel, and, one could argue, the protagonist learns it from Riitu, Simpanen, and Hoikkanen. Yet it is also his own: it is something he becomes, or is, since the others are his doubles (in a metafictional reading), or projections (in a psychological reading). Furthermore, there are some events the readers can become sure of during the course of the story. Two incidents in Part Two are noteworthy also when assessing the role of the protagonist in the rape.

In the first incident, readers are led to understand that the protagonist slips sleeping pills into Raiski’s drink when they are spending an evening with Lili. The narrator mentions, as if in passing, that “[a]fter some time, Raiski fell asleep. His wine glass happened to contain quite an amount of sleeping pills.”

---

225 Thus not only Lili and Nastasya Filippovna (see also Salin 2002, 180, 190), also Marke and Nastasya are connected—and this creates a connection also between Lili and Marke although they never meet.

226 “[H]änen ajatustensa—eivät hänen tekojensa—pirulliset langat kietovat samaan kadotukseen koko lähitympäristöön.” (Sarajas 1953/1980, 72.)

The narrator never confesses that he put the pills into the drink, but the hint is clear. His actions can perhaps be justified because he has been desperate to spend time alone with Lili, and readers might have some sympathy for him because of this. But since readers at this point already know about Dr. Finckelman and his habit of using poison, it is hard to dismiss the greater significance of the event, although no harm is done in the end. No matter how understandable the protagonist’s motives might be, it is clear that he breaks the ethical codes of his profession. This ignoring of morals and use of drugs (poison) to take Raiski out of the picture connects him to Dr. Finckelman.

An even more problematic incident involves the protagonist’s relationship with judge Niilas’ wife, Irma. When the narrator introduces Niilas for the first time, he hints that Niilas wanted him to start an affair with Irma so that Niilas himself could spend time with a new mistress (who turns out to be Lili). Later, the protagonist agrees to admit Irma in the psychiatric hospital so that Niilas could get a divorce. As usual, we only have the narrator’s word on the matter, but he says he was only following Niilas’s requests. Readers who are familiar with the history of psychiatry and the power imbalance between (male) doctors and (female) patients likely find this suspicious. It is easy to come to the conclusion that something is wrong: Korpela creates a clear reference to the literary tradition of men who lock their wives inside mental institutions in order to be able to start new lives with new spouses. Yet this puts Niilas in a worse light; the protagonist is only an accomplice.

When the police and the “whole city” have started to suspect the protagonist of the rape, he tries to find comfort from Irma, who, he believes, also thinks that he is guilty. It is now revealed that the protagonist is playing the roles of a “lover” and doctor at the same time:

– But Irma! Irma dear! You have not understood me… You are mistaken… You have not realized that I am ready for anything for you… Irma darling! I said, and added some even more foolish things, and at the same time I thought: Well, well, all right! There’s another one who has such a strong conviction about my guilt. Well, go ahead; conviction has saved many deep-water souls. “Dear Irma…”

227 “Jonkin ajan kuluttua Raiski nukahti. Hänen viinilasinsa sisälsi näet melkoisen annoksen unilääkettä.” (TF 159.)
228 This is part of an interesting dynamic between the protagonist and Niilas. In addition to the protagonist helping Niilas, also Niilas “saves” the protagonist multiple times throughout the novel: he helps the protagonist to win the battle over the uncle’s will and to defend himself against charges of rape (and directs the blame toward Saleva). Niilas also hints that the protagonist should quickly sell his quarry shares before they become worthless, and he sells them to Mellonen, causing his bankruptcy. During the “symposium” it is also hinted that Niilas (not just the protagonist) has a mysterious past with Lili. Other readers have paid attention to the connections between the protagonist and Saleva, but actually more strange connections exist between the protagonist and Niilas.
Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation

It worked. In the end she was very satisfied with me.

It is good to test some new methods of treatment—if it even was a new one, I laughed in my mind as I walked home from Irma’s place. Well, whatever, I added. Irma has a body like one should. And in this doctor’s business, who cares about the soul.

– Mutta Irma! Irma rakas! Et ole minua ymmärtänyt… Olet ymmärtänyt minun aivan väärin. Et ole aavistanut, että sinun takiasi olen valmis kaikkeen… Irma kultaseni! sanoin, ja yhtä ja toista vieläkin hullumpaan, samalla kun ajattelin: Jaa, jaa, vai niin! Siis taas yksi, joka uskoo vuoren varmasti minun syyllisyyteeni. Noh, usko pois, uskon kautta on pelastunut moni syvänveden sielu. “Rakas Irma…”

Se tepsi. Hän oli lopulta minuun hyvin tyytyväinen.

Onhan hyvä kokeilla uusia hoitomenetelmiä, – mikäli se nyt oli vallan uusikaan, naurahdin itsekseni astellessani yön pimeydessä Irman luota omaan asuntooni. No mikäs siinä, lisäsin, ruumis on Irmalla niin kuin ol-lakin pitää. Ja sielusta ei ole niin väliäään näissä lääkärinpuuhissa. (TF 270.)

Again, the narrator leaves out what happens, but despite the gap in the narration (marked with dots in the text), it is clear from the hints. What is perhaps most aggravating is the fact that although there is a frame of a love affair (the narrator portrays Irma as being in love with him and the affair is supported by Niilas), the protagonist acts in his role of a psychiatrist. The perspective is again that of the experiencing I, and he refers to the abuse of his patient as a treatment method. The readers can now be sure that the protagonist has slept with (and abused) at least one of his patients. “Doctor’s business” is also a direct reference to Dr. Finckelman (see also Salin 2002, 112–113): by now the protagonist has started to identify with the imaginary figure. He has acted as “Finckelman” in front of other people when drunk, and even fantasized about strangling Lili. He has also introduced himself as “Dr. Finckelman” at the crime scene of the rape. As many readers have suggested, the protagonist has become Dr. Finckelman, an evil scientist, a devil, an Übermensch (see, e.g., Envall 1988).

As noted, although the narrator controls or filters everything the other characters say or do, many comments from other characters point to problems in the narrator’s ethics. Toward the end, when the protagonist’s morals are suspected by the other characters, there are more of these incidents. Yet, already at the very beginning of Part Two, Raiski gives a description of the protagonist which hints that there is something wrong and which becomes more meaningful later. Raiski does this in midst of an emotional turmoil, angry at the protagonist because he does not empathize with his anger at Niilas (Raiski is jealous of Nii-las because he spends time with Lili):

But I know what you are. I have known for a long time: you are a cunning observer, cold and ruthless man, a real devil, that’s what you are! You look at people only as if they were some interesting specimen, like a scientist.
looks at animals, guinea pigs, what are they called. You’re a real filth, that’s what you are!

Mutta kyllä minä nyt tiedän mikä sinä olet. Olen jo kauan tietänyt: pirulilinen tarkkailija, kylmä ja säälimätön mies, oikea saatana sinä olet! Kaikkia ihmisistä katsot vain mielenkiintoisina yksityistapauksina kuin joku tiedemies elukoita, marsuja vai mitä ne ovat. Oikea kyttä sinä olet! (TF 120.)

As on many other occasions (for example when Marke accuses the protagonist of “making her a whore”; or in the “doctor’s business” scene when Irma accuses him of being an emotionally dead, brutal doctor who has “no knowledge of the female soul”\textsuperscript{229}), readers have two options. Either we can believe Raiski and take the accusations as a hint about the cruelty of the protagonist’s “science.” Or, we can trust the narrator and accept that Raiski is only rambling. Things take another turn, as the narrator defends himself against Raiski’s accusations, but at the same time reveals to the readers:

\begin{itemize}
  \item You are mistaken, my brother, I said adamantly. Because Raiski really was mistaken: he thought too well of me. Because I was only playing. My toys were people. I knew them all too well already.
  \item Erehdyt hyvä veli, sanoin järkähtämättömästi. Sillä todellakin Raiski oli erehtynyt, hän luuli minutä liian hyvää. Sillä minähän vain leikittelin. Minun leluni olivat ihmisia. Minä tunsin jo heidät liian hyvin. (TF 120.)
\end{itemize}

He makes an admission to his readers: Raiski’s mistake is that he thinks too highly of him. Paradoxically, this is likely to draw readers closer: his confession has a melancholic tone that gives an impression that he is being too hard on himself, directing the interpretation toward mental problems rather than moral ones. Raiski’s accusations are also so hyperbolic (and comical, e.g., his loss of words: “guinea pigs, what are they”) that they are ironized in turn. The narrator-protagonist’s misogyny, misanthropism, and nihilism also begin to appear as roles that are covering something else. The question remains: is he mad, bad or both? The scene continues:

\begin{itemize}
  \item You are mistaken, you don’t know me through and through, I repeated. Because in fact I too had a life, another life, a more real life in which I lived with Lerkkanen and Riitu and Finckelman and in which I was a devoted and a trustworthy friend. Me, an actual Finckelman…
  \item Erehdyt, et tunne minua pohjia myöten, kertasin, sillä oihan elämä toisaan minullakin, toinen, todellisempi, oikea, jota elin Lerkkasen ja Riitun ja
\end{itemize}

\textsuperscript{229} Irma accuses the protagonist in many ways: “You are a nerve doctor, but you cannot heal. There is no human in you… Your emotions have died… You are brutal. You’ll take anyone but you cannot follow the deepest currents of an actual female soul, you don’t even have a clue…” (“Olet hermolääkäri, mutta et osaa parantaa. Sinussa ei ole ihmistä… Tunteesi ovat kuolleet… Olet brutaali. Sinulle riittää kuka tahansa, mutta todellisen naissielun syvimmää virtoja et osaa seurata, et edes aavistaa…” ) (TF 270.)
Finckelmanin kanssa ja jossa minä olin altis ja luotettava ystävä. Minä, itse Finckelman... (TF 120–121.)

He lives a “truer” life, an imagined life, in the company of Dr. Finckelman, as “an actual Finckelman.”

From Unreliability to Undecidability

The narrator of Tohtori Finckelman often under- or misreports events: he leaves gaps in his story, but also keeps on hinting and denying things, and not doing a very good job at covering his tracks—a strategy used by Korpela to remind readers of the narrator’s unreliability. Furthermore, he creates an impression of naïveté and irony, hinting that the experiencing I is misinterpreting what happens around him (see also Salin 2002, 155). The narrator’s reports about certain events can be questioned, either because he might be deliberately lying in order to hide his actions, or because he himself is not conscious of what he experiences and because his mind is shattering. His perception of the world around him, of women, his ideology and ethics are deeply troubling, especially from the perspective of a reader in the 2010s, but the protagonist’s emotional detachment from others and experiences of being above moral codes were noticed also by the earliest readers in the 1950s. The protagonist sees himself as a machine, and other people as his puppets—something that most likely is alarming to any reader in any historical context. Even though readers’ values change in time, the text gives so many hints of the narrator-protagonist’s misogyny that they are almost impossible to miss.

It is thus safe to say that the narrator-protagonist is a misogynous character. What remains open is why and to what extent? Is he also a rapist? We could say that as a young man— influenced by Riitu and the other men— the protagonist begins to see the world in a morally unsustainable light, resulting in complete alienation and estrangement from other people and society. We might begin to suspect that even when writing his story (his “novel”) after the breakdown, the narrator is trying to turn the blame away from himself and to hide his actions. Especially the two incidents which shed light on his “doctor’s business”—drugging Raiski and having sex with Irma—gather evidence that could be used to accuse him of the rape. Yet, in this reading we would end up judging him based on something else than the actual crime (an interpretive act that is highly problematic, as Camus’s L’Étranger reminds its readers).

As Salin remarks, the narrator is most unreliable when narrating the rape scene: the events are depicted from the perspective of the experiencing I who is in a confused state. The narrator leaves gaps in the story and the readers never find out—without at least a hint of doubt—whether he is guilty or not, and whether even the narrator himself knows this or not. (See Salin 2002, 40; 200.)
There are some grounds for claiming that the rape does not happen in the storyworld, but only in the narrator’s imagination or hallucinations, and that it is a sign of a more existential kind of suffering and guilt—but this would be a very generalizing, allegorical reading that would make much of what happens in the novel irrelevant. The lack of information and the protagonist’s delusional state of mind in the rape scene make it impossible to know what actually happens. The unreliability is turning into undecidability and uncertainty, and the ontological status of the storyworld is at stake: we are on the “sur-realist” level of the text. As Ansgar Nünning (2008, 41) points out, “the notion of unreliability presupposes that an objective view of the world, of others, and of oneself can be attained.” This becomes uncertain as we take a closer look at the borders between the actual world and the “other” world where Dr. Finckelman exists.

3.4. The Other World

Like in Kaunis sielu, in Tohtori Finckelman the readers encounter another world inside the storyworld, one of imagination and hallucinations. However, in addition to the narrator-protagonist’s experiential world, there are also other levels of reality that create different kinds of structures of meaning. These consist of mise-en-abyme structures and intertexts which offer new paths for interpretations, such as Riitu’s stories, which the protagonist supplements and which are built into larger universes of meaning, or allusions to the other fictional worlds like those created by Dostojevsky and Camus. Reading Tohtori Finckelman, we are invited to maintain several different realities at the same time: the “realist” and the “sur-realist” levels of the storyworld, and the worlds of meaning created by the intra- and intertextual allusions and references.

The best example of the complexity of different levels is Chapter 27 which depicts the rape. The events are narrated mostly from the perspective of the experiencing I who is in a shattering state, and this makes it possible for the narrator to claim that he does not know what actually happened (see also Salin 2002, 200–201). The beginning of the chapter reminds us of the prodromal symptoms of psychosis: the world around the protagonist is getting a curious meaning, and the atmosphere could be described as delusional (see Sass 1994, 44–45). Furthermore, there are strong parallels between the protagonist’s experiences and the way Camus depicts Meursault’s thoughts and sensations just before his crime in L’Étranger: the weather is hot, they are close to water, the narration focuses on bodily sensations, and there is a feeling of heaviness and pressure (see Camus 1942, 92–95; see also Salin 2002, 201). So again, there are at least two mutually intertwined paths for interpretation: psychological and metafictional (intertextual).
Let us look at the chapter more carefully. It begins with the narrator recounting that he was very tired after a week at the hospital and that he was suffering from the oppressive heat. In the previous chapter, which the narrator has named “the fatal chapter,” he has had the horrible argument with Lili. He has talked about his Übermensch morality to Lili and Lili has called him insane and “Finckelman.” After the encounter, the protagonist has deeply regretted his behavior: he has realized that he has said things he was in no way meaning to say (already when talking to Lili he has felt that “some unknown force” was putting the words in his mouth). In short, readers can see that he is in a very unstable state of mind. He now goes to a lakeside near the hospital and sits on a stone (recall the stone from Part One).

A careful description of his bodily experiences and sensations follows, also focusing on his bodily memories and evoking sensory imagination:

I am bareheaded and without a coat. I go the lake shore nearby and sit on a stone. The lake is smooth as glass, the trees are reflected in the water and they look very tall, the water seems to continue endlessly. The pressure down there must be immense, it occurs to me, it must be hard to breathe. But I breathe freely again now, I draw breath for a long time so that I don’t die out of lack of oxygen. The air is somehow oppressive, I feel tired, I don’t think about anything. And when I caress the stone, it feels weirdly familiar. Have I once in the past read mysterious things from its side? It is difficult to leave from there, from the stone, it is as if I were glued on the spot. I get up anyway, I take a few steps. But when I walk further, the air starts to feel weirdly familiar. It is as if there was a thin veil on it. I try to remember, I try to remember, perhaps once before I have been somehow close to this air and this current state? Where? When? Was it perhaps in my youth or in a completely foreign land and long, long time ago? Or perhaps in my past life? I lift my feet mechanically and I don’t really know who I am. Perhaps I am just someone who is here by accident.

---

230 “Jokin tuntematon voima” (TF 257).
The air is heavy, and he is caressing the stone, imagining “mysterious things.” The narrator adapts himself once again almost completely to the perspective of the experiencing I: the questions are asked from the point of view of the protagonist who is in the forest, walking, and trying to find answers. Several interpretations are offered: there is a feeling of mystery, and it is suggested that the protagonist somehow returns to the stone of his youth, or even to a more ancient time, to a “foreign land.” He first feels that he is “glued” to the stone and then experiences a “veil” in the air (recall the veil from the forest of his youth). He is “mechanically” lifting his feet and does not “really know who he is.” There is a loss of sense of self and time, as Salin (2002, 201) also notes. The experiences can be interpreted as prodromal symptoms: the delusional atmosphere is coloring the world around him and it seems that an episode of psychosis or dissociation is developing. Yet, at the same time, the possibility of a mystical explanation is maintained and the text creates an intratextual allusion to Part One.

The narrator continues by recounting that he was distressed by another person in the forest who feels “weirdly distant” and should stay on their “own side.” Suddenly he moves to the “other land,” that “does not exist”:

Anyway, this is good... It is much better like this...

This is how I speak quietly and walk ahead. A person comes toward me. S/he seems weirdly distant. Why won’t you leave me in peace, I would like to say. Stay on your own side...

And I went [sic] to the land that does not exist, and I watched the movement of nothingness there. And it was a good land, there was no burden on the shoulders, no ring around my temple, it felt light to be. And I said to all of them: This is a good land, the air smells empty... I am part of the same tribe, exactly, the same: only a piece of air, a light breeze, I don’t smell like anything... And they accepted me fully...

Joka tapauksessa näin on hyvä... On paljon parempi näin...

Noin puhelen hiljaa ja kuljen eteenpäin. Joku ihminen tulee vastaan. Hän vaikuttaa oudon etäiseltä. Miksi ette jätä minua rauhaan, haluaisin hänelle sanoa. Pysykää omalla puolellanne...

Ja minä menin [sic] maahan jota ei ole, katselin siellä olemattomuuden liikettä. Ja se oli hyvä maa, ei ollut punnuksia hartiolla eikä rengasta ohmoni ympärillä, oli kevyt olla. Ja sanoin heille kaikille: Tämäpäs on hyvä maa, ilma tuoksuu tyhjälle ... Olen samaa heimoa, niin juuri, aivan samaa: vain palanen ilmaa, ohut henkäys, en haise millekään ... Ja he hyväksyivät minut täydellisesti ... (TF 260.)

Whereas he first was (as if) in the forest of his youth, he is now in the “other land” with his “friends”: the realities are overlapping. The other land is a place where the protagonist is “completely accepted.” He feels that he belongs there: he now feels light, there are no burdens, no smells—and he also appears to be disembodied, detached, and dissociated from his actions. However, he soon seems to “return” to the forest and says to himself cryptically:

So I am walking here, I say to myself just to say something. I feel enormous pity for myself because I am walking in that spot, there, and I feel even more enormous pity because it is me. But I try to not think about it, it is enough that I get to take a look at the yard where the unshackled people are...

Minä siis tässä kävelen, sanon sitten itselleni pareman puutteessa. Tunnen suurta sääliä itseäni kohtaan sen johdosta, että kävelen sillä kohtaa, siinä, ja vielä suurempaa sikiä että se olen juuri minä. Mutta koetan olla ajattelemaa sitäkaan, riittää kun sanan ohimennen vilkaista kahleettomien pihalle... (TF 260.)

He seems to be longing to the “other side” where people are “unshackled.” After the thoughts of self-pity, he suddenly hears a sound which bisects the time (and which could be interpreted as a trigger of dissociation):

I hear three sharp whistles in my ears. They do pierce the air a little bit unpleasantly and it is as if they were dividing the time into two, but otherwise I don’t care about them at all. I start walking in their direction, I don’t know why.

Kuulen kolme terävää vihellystä korvissani, ne vihlaisevat kyllä vähän epämiellyttävästi ja jakavat ajan ikään kuin kahtia, mutta muuten en niistä välitä yhtään. Lähden kulkemaan niiden suuntaan, en tiedä miksi. (TF 260.)

He claims that he does not care about the whistles “at all” but negates this statement instantly by starting to walk in their direction, not knowing why (note the motif of doing things automatically, without volition).

He then sees again a person walking in front of him and starts to follow them (the Finnish pronouns allow that the gender is not revealed), but still feeling that he is detached from others:

I don’t know who they are [...]. And I don’t want to know, because people are very far from me now [...]. They reach the edge of the forest. I go after them, my feet appear to be in that direction and take me forward, they carry me well, my body is light as a feather and it weighs almost nothing.

En tunne häntä [...]. Enkä välitäkään tuntea, sillä ihmiset ovat minusta hyvin kaukana nyt [...]. Hän ehti metsän rajaan. Menen hänen perässään, jalkani näet sattuvat olemaan juuri siinä suunnassa ja vievät eteenpäin, ne kantavat minua oikein hyvin, ruumis kun minulla on höyhnenenkevyt eikä paina paljon mitään. (TF 261.)

Again his feet are taking him forward without effort and his body feels light. Then he suddenly starts to speak in a language he himself cannot recognize: “I splutter out vague words, I don’t know what language that is. Perhaps it is Lili language... My eyes spread, and I live an ancient life..."231 He seems to be in an exhilarating mood which sometimes comes over him when he is in contact with Lili (see also Salin 2002, 204)—and we can also recall the dance with the actress of Holy Virgin in Part One. Then he suddenly realizes that he is following two people:

There are two human beings walking in front of me, I realize, I am not alone although I should be. The other one was [sic] bigger, the other one smaller, a man and a woman, to be exact. Something familiar in them both. Everything is [sic] familiar to me now, stones, trees, people. Where are they going? What is the purpose of my life at the moment...

The tense changes again for a sentence: the narrator explains that the people were different sizes, a man and a woman. Then the tense returns to the present: there is a sense of strange familiarity in everything around him. The different levels of reality continue to exist simultaneously: he is in the forest but also in his youth and in “the other land.” The two people have somehow infiltrated his hallucinatory world. He wonders what “the purpose” of his life is.

He keeps on following the man and the woman but suddenly feels uncomfortable: “My path doesn’t feel as reliable as before, different kinds of feet trample it and make it dirty.”232 He also has a strange thought about being a shadow (following the people) and starts bragging to himself: “I am a shadow behind the children of men, it comes to my mind. It is metaphorical speech, I explain to myself, it is very well said, not many people could say like that. Because I am light as a feather, I fly on my heels...”233 He rushes on, as his feet are taking him forward into this “mysterious” world:

I walk and I walk. Then I stop. I have a feeling as if the world is filled with mysterious things.

I startle. Was it Reseda? The thought flashes in my consciousness like a lightning, I have perhaps been thinking about this the whole way. But I should have realized it. I have suspected.

But who is the other?

Three sharp whistles! I can remember them, they were just presented...

---

231 “Sopertelen suullani epämääräisiä sanoja, en tiedä mitä kieltä se oikein on. Ehkä se on lillikieltä... Silmäni leviävät ja elän ammoin elettäjä elämää...” (TF 261.)

232 “Ei polkuni ei tunnu enää yhtä luotettavalta kuin juuri äsken, kaikenlaiset jalat polkevat sitä likaiseksi.” (TF 261.)

233 “Olen varjo ihmisten vanavedessä, välähtää mieleeni. Se on vertauskuvallista puhetta, seliän itselleni, se on hyvin sattuvasti sanottu, moni ei osaisikaan niin sanoa. Sillä olen höyhen kevyt, liitelen kantapäällä...” (TF 261.)
Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation

So what? What should I do? Should I do anything? The whole day I have been keeping company with maniacs and neurotics. There is freedom in the forest...

Suddenly Reseda comes to his mind and the protagonist thinks that “he has suspected” something but we do not learn what. He seems to recall the three whistles, and starts to struggle with himself and what he should do. He appears to be tired after working “with the maniacs” all week; responsibility weighs on him. The last sentence is unfinished but seems to be meant to direct our thoughts to the freedom enjoyed by Dr. Finckelman: being above moral codes, without “shackles,” having no responsibility or duty to anyone.

Then comes the rape scene:

I know now what is going on, I am sure. A strange feeling of powerlessness and shame overrides me, I stand there without moving. I stand and I stand. A moment later I recognize a strange growl, it is as if some animal was uttering something, spit falling from its mouth. It is lust, I say to myself. Are these human beings? I ask.

Then the other one, the man, says something, I cannot hear what. Perhaps he forbade because the growl became quiet, silent. Then there is only panting.

Suddenly I whistle, three times, sharply. It is Reseda, I say to myself, it is her! But I must protect her, after all, I am bound by duty. Who is the other? It is him, I say, probably it is him, most certainly it is him...

He seems to be in shock: he feels powerless, ashamed, unable to move, listening. It is as if he were the victim. Suddenly he whistles three times and becomes again convinced that the other person is Reseda. He realizes that he has a “duty” to “protect” her. He first suspects and then is sure who the man is (recall his habit of becoming sure of something he has imagined), but only refers to “him” with the pronoun and we never learn a name. He then runs to the scene: “I jump out from my hiding place. The man has just stood up, the three whistles have surprised him. I see him disappearing to the thicket like a shadow.”

We are told that the man escapes to the forest (note the simile, like a “shadow”) and he is left alone with Reseda who seems to be unconscious. Moments later he introduces himself to the passers-by as “Dr. Finckelman” (TF 263). He takes Reseda to the surgical hospital and tells a surgeon (who he says is his friend) to examine her, explaining quite nonsensically: “Perhaps an operation has to be performed.” All the details point to the interpretation that he is now Dr. Finckelman.

Three Interpretive Paths

How should readers interpret the scene? In it everything we have been told earlier is used in a thick composition. There is the familiar style of thought: doubt, constant denials, and bragging. There are the familiar motifs: the stone, the veil, the sensations of heaviness and lightness, the machine-like quality, the other world, and the sense of being guided involuntarily. The description of the pressure and the ominous feeling at the beginning resembles the prodromal stages of psychosis, and the “other land,” its lightness and meaningfulness, could be interpreted as a world of full-blown psychosis. The description of the “time split in two” could be a sign of dissociative trauma. The narration even hints at vicarious trauma experienced by someone witnessing an act of violence: he is overwhelmed by powerlessness and shame. On the other hand, there are hints at the protagonist’s past and something “mystical.” It is strange how the protagonist first seems to be following the whistles involuntarily and then suddenly whistles himself. The biggest question disturbing readers is: is the protagonist guilty of rape? And this question leads to others: What do his experiences of paralysis and shame mean? Why does he whistle? Is he the “shadow” or the other man? Who is he? Why does he introduce himself as “Dr. Finckelman”? In the following passages, the narrator recounts how the other characters in the storyworld started to suspect him of the rape, and the readers probably will, too. The text invites readers to take different interpretative paths. I discuss these under the following topics: 1) the intratextual connection between the rape scene and Lieutenant Saleva’s earlier blackmail scene, 2) the mise-en-abyme structures (Raiski’s novel and Riitu’s story), and 3) the feelings of guilt.

---

234 “Ryntään lymypaikastani esiin. Mies on juuri noussut, kolme vihellystä on hänet yllättänyt. Näen hänen varjona haihtuvan tihiköön.” (TF 262–263.)
235 “–Kenties on suoritettava leikkaus [...].” (TF 263.)
Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation

(1) Saleva’s Scene

Several hints point to Saleva’s guilt and he ultimately confesses the rape (although later it becomes clear that he has made the confession under pressure). One of these hints is an earlier scene which anticipates the rape scene, as Salin (2002, 202) notes. In Chapter 23, when Saleva has accused the protagonist of sleeping with the nurses and patients of the hospital and then left the protagonist’s office, the protagonist has heard three whistles coming from the outside. He has been upset about Saleva’s accusations—which we know to be at least partly true—and refused to be blackmailed by him. What is interesting is that right after hearing the whistles, the protagonist “moves” to the other world and only “returns” when Reseda appears at his office:

I turned my back to the vile slanders and left the gossips there.
Suddenly I woke up, I heard three sharp whistles; the window was open. But I didn’t pay any special attention to this, I just remarked it. Because I moved away from here, I ended up in a strange region, I, the deep-water fish. And the pressure was enormous down there, the weight of the masses above my head, I felt it with my every nerve. […]
From those sentiments I was woken up by Reseda. She was standing at my door with a bouquet of flowers in her hands. She had gone to pick them. The door had been open, she had been able to come in. Her cheeks were rosy, she was staring at me incessantly like always. She gave me the flowers. I thanked. Where had she gotten them? From the forest.

Käänsin selkäni kaikelle alhaiselle ja jäin juorut siihen paikkaan.
Havahduin, kuulin kolme terävää vihellystä, ikkuna kun oli auki. Mutta en kiinnittänyt siihen erikoista huomioita, vain totesin. Sillä minä siirryin täältä pois, osuin oudolle seudulle, minä syvänmeren kala. Ja paine oli siellä hirvittävä, vesimassojen paino päällä, tunsin sen jokaisella hermolanni. […]
Noista tunnelmista minut herätti Reseda. Hän seisoi ovellani kukkimppu kädessä. Oli käynyt poimimassa. Ovi oli jäänyt auki, hän oli päässyt sisään, hän oli siellä hirvittävä, vesimassojen paino päällä, tunsin sen jokaisella hermolanni. […]

In this move to the other world the protagonist experiences immense pressure, just like at the very beginning of Chapter 27 at the lake shore. There is no lightness, no enjoyment, but he tells himself that he will “get used” to the pressure and make friends: he then summons Lerkkanen and Finckelman and goes to his “own people” (TF 185). When he wakes up, Reseda is there, and we learn that she has been in the forest and brought him flowers. After reading the rape scene, we can connect this earlier scene to it. In the rape scene the whistles the protagonist hears seem to first remind him of Reseda, but in the middle of the rape it is suddenly the protagonist himself who whistles three times, and then rushes to help her. As mentioned earlier, the whistles could also be interpreted as triggering an experience of dissociation or depersonalization in the protagonist. Who is he and what happens to him during his visits to the “other world”?

In the end, the protagonist is certain that he is innocent and that Saleva is guilty, but it is unlikely that any reader would be convinced: Saleva’s guilt is not conclusive, there are also many things that hint otherwise. His confession seems forced and there are many reasons to suspect the protagonist who, as we can infer, uses his profession and judge Niilas’s help to be cleared of the charges. Most importantly: Reseda identifies the protagonist as the rapist. The protagonist claims that Reseda (who according to the protagonist is “retarded”) has been in love with him and is “fantasizing”, and he uses his institutional powers to silence her and to shift the blame on Saleva (TF 275). Based on everything we know about the protagonist’s misogynous ideas he appears as highly unreliable in his self-defense. On the other hand, it does seem that (also) Saleva has been abusing Reseda: during what is described as a “long interrogation” he confesses that he has been whistling outside the hospital to call Reseda to join him in the forest (TF 276).

Kauko Kare (1952/1996, 360) and Matti Vainio (1975, 190) have suggested that Saleva and the narrator-protagonist are actually one and the same person. Saleva is guilty, but so is the narrator (see also Salin 2002, 204–205; 218–219). On the one hand, the whistling supports the interpretation that Saleva is the protagonist’s double (or a manifestation of his “subconscious,” as suggested by Sarajas 1953/1980, 72). On the other hand, as Salin (2002, 220) argues, we should read Saleva as a character who does exist in the storyworld, not only as a part of the protagonist’s unconscious or dissociated personality. Even though Saleva is the protagonist’s double in many ways, they are not strictly the same. The protagonist has also other doubles: Niilas, Mellonen, Simpanen, and especially the imaginary-hallucinatory Dr. Finckelman, whose identity he fully adopts after the rape. Readers are left to oscillate between the protagonist’s and Saleva’s guilt—unless we agree that the guilt is somehow shared between the two, as Kare (1952/1996, 360–361), Vainio (1975, 190) and Sarajas (1953/1980, 72) imply.

(2) Mise-en-abyme Structures: (a) Raiski’s Novel and (b) Riitu’s Story
Secondly, it is possible to look for answers from the mise-en-abyme structures of the novel, as Salin (2002, 208–216) has done in her reading. Riitu’s story and writer Raiski’s novel both reflect the crime. Reading the scene in terms of mirror structures makes sense especially because the other characters are more like webs of intertextual connections than “mimetic” figures resembling actual people. We have come far from the reading of the protagonist through common psychological frames. As discussed in Chapter 1, Tohtori Finckelman cannot—as if any fictional text even could—be read only through real-world frames: it uses them, connects them to other readings of other texts, and creates a composition that follows aesthetic principles and has ethical functions, in addition to evoking experiences of dissociation, hallucination, and psychosis.

Let us first look at the connection between writer Raiski’s novel and the rape (2a). In an early discussion between the protagonist and Lili, he has told her about Raiski’s novel. Later readers can notice that the novel (or what little we learn about it) reflects perfectly the situation after the rape. The protagonist explains the story to Lili:

Some man has committed a murder but says that despite everything he is innocent. He cannot explain, he is a simple human being, but he feels that he is innocent. He has been guided by strange powers at the time of the murder... It is about something like that.

Eräs mies on tehnyt murhan, mutta väittää olevansa syytön siitä huolimatta. Hän ei osaa selittää, hän on yksinkertainen ihminen, mutta hän tuntee olevansa viaton, hänä ovat murhan hetkellä johtaneet vieraat voimat... Jotakin sellaista siinä kerrotaan. (TF 160.)

There are several connections to the protagonist: he too often feels that he is “guided by strange powers.” Sometimes this can be interpreted as a symptom of mental distress, sometimes as a hint of “mystical things.” In Raiski’s novel, the man is convicted, but Lili thinks that this is wrong. The protagonist tells her that also Raiski, the author, has started to regret the ending:

– This is what Raiski thinks too, he has changed his position. Or he is uncertain, falters. But I disagree. The way the author produces evidence is not convincing, it is not certain enough that the protagonist would be innocent.
– Can it be proved then? No, it can’t be because no one can see the soul of another human being. Who is guilty, who is innocent – who is able to tell? Can you?
– One has to be able to, it is part of the profession. In light the of modern psychology... or how should I say—the brilliant insights of modern psychology... One of the basic truths of psychoanalysis is, you see...
– Stop blabbering!

– On pakko voida, se kuuluu ammattiin. Nykyaikaisen psykologian valossa...tai kuinka sanoisin – uuden psykologian nerokkaat oivallukset... Psykoanalyysin perustotouksiin kuuluu nähkääs...

236 As Salin (2002, 215) notes, the description of Raiski’s novel also anticipates the crime Lili commits at the end.
In this discussion, the protagonist takes the position that it is possible to decide who is guilty or innocent. He relies on “modern psychology.” He seems to imply that there are no “strange powers” that could be blamed, other than those that can be found via psychoanalysis. If we take the protagonist at his word and if Raiski’s novel and the rape mirror each other, then there are no alleviating circumstances, no mysterious “forces” that can be said to have caused the crime. We, the readers, have access “to the soul” of the protagonist through the book we are reading: we can go through all the evidence, assess his thoughts, speech and actions, connect them and make a judgment about his guilt or innocence. However, based on their thoughts about Raiski’s novel, it seems that Lili and Raiski would absolve the protagonist from the crime—and as we learn much later in the epilogue, Oskari, Pomila, and Lili will do exactly this, for no matter what the protagonist has done (or failed to do), they will give him another chance—and following the example given by the other characters, so might the readers as well.

Another, even more important mise-en-abyme structure is the story that Riitu begins and the protagonist supplements (2b) (see also Salin 2002, 208–216). As we have learned, in Part One Riitu introduces the characters of Lerkkanen and Ellinora to the protagonist, who invents Dr. Finckelman. In Part Two, in Chapter 25, the group of friends (the protagonist, Mellonen, Raiski, Niilas, Lili, later Saleva and Pomila) have the party (“the symposium”) at Mellonen’s club and each participant offers monologues about the meaning of life, except the protagonist who is quiet and seems alienated. He, however, would not want to be a “bystander” and suddenly, when he seems to be drunk, he decides to tell a story about Finckelman, Riitu, Lerkkanen, and Ellinora. Raiski reveals that the protagonist has been talking about Finckelman sometimes before when he has been drinking, and encourages the protagonist to tell them more. So he does. He begins his story with Riitu and Lerkkanen, reflecting the way also Riitu used to tell his stories, talking about flagrant crimes and belittling them: “And I recounted the funny tricks they made—robberies, murders, rapes—but so cunningly that they were always able to show that they were innocent.” He then tells the party-goers how Finckelman joined the group and describes the doctor’s view of morals (supplementing Riitu’s story):

---

237 The irony is that he is unable to clarify how “modern psychology” or “psychoanalysis” could explain anything. We never learn the “basic truths of psychoanalysis” because Lili wisely tells the protagonist to stop explaining. It is possible to guess what he would have said, drawing from the straw-man Nietzschean-Freudian philosophy he seems to have developed: that every human being is guided by violent sexual drives and unconscious urges (these become visible, e.g., when the protagonist is about to strangle Lili).

238 “Ja minä kerroin kuinka he tekivät hauskoja keposia – ryöstöjä, murhia, raiskauksia – mutta niin ovelasti, että aina oli näyttää puhtaat paperit.” (TF 212.)
Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation

– And then the group was joined by Finckelman: a civilized, fine man, respected in the society, fancied by women, genius, who was above all crime...
– What do you mean by that?
– It's very simple. No crime exists in itself, reasoned Finckelman, there are only customs, habits, a common decision that one thing is seen as appropriate, another one as inappropriate and marked with the word ‘crime’. Finckelman could not take this, he looked at things from a higher branch. He too drew some lines, but the lines he drew crossed a different terrain than those of regular citizens.

– No sitten saksiin tuli Finckelman: sivistynyt, hieno mies, yhteiskunnan kunnioittama, naisten ihastus, äly, joka oli kaikkien rikosten yläpuolella...
– Mitä sillä tarkoitat?

He explains Finckelman’s moral code to the others: moral norms are only habits, there is no crime in itself, no good or evil, only arbitrary rules drawn up by people. Finckelman’s is an ethics of complete relativism: he too “draws lines” but not where other people do, he is above all ethics. The protagonist then tells his audience how Riitu, Lerkkanen, and Finckelman fight over Ellinora, and how in the morning they find her dead. According to the story, Finckelman decides to frame her death as a suicide by hanging. This horrifies Lili:

– [...] One can of course hang a dead person, he thought; with someone who is alive it is different, it is best to kill that one with poison...
– You say horrible things!
– Finckelman was like that, Riitu was the one who told this to me.

– [...] Kyllä kuolleen voi aina hirttää, hän ajatteli; elävän kanssa on asia toisin, se on paras tappaa myrkyllä...
– Tehän puhutte hirveitä!
– Finckelman oli sellainen, Riitu tämän minulle kertoi. (TF 214.)

The protagonist hides behind Riitu, who “told this to him,” and evades questions about storyteller’s responsibility. The story, in other worlds, “belongs” to someone else—although we know that Dr. Finckelman is the protagonist’s own invention. After this, the storytelling is interrupted. Mellonen returns to the party after kicking out the drunk Saleva and the protagonist does not get to finish the story—and actually he even could not, as the narrator confesses that he had run out of ideas.

Later, Lili and the protagonist are alone together, and Lili wants to know the end of the story:
– [...] So how did it go? Who was guilty?
I was in trouble, I did not know how to reply. I had forgotten the whole story. – Finckelman, I said at random.
– He?
– Yes. He had given poison to Ellinora…
[...]– What an interesting man. Do you know him?
– Very well.
– It would be great to meet him. Bring him with you sometime, when you visit.
– Thank you, definitely!

– No miten siinä kävi? Kuka oli syyllinen?
Olin pahassa pinteessä, en tiennyt miten olisin vastannut. Olin unohtanut jo koko kertomuksen. – Finckelman, sanoin summassa.
– Hänkö?
– Niin. Hän oli antanut Ellinoralle myrkkyä…
[...]– Olipa mielenkiintoinen mies. Tunnetteko hänet?
– Oikein hyvin.
– Olisi hauska tutustua. Tuokaa hänet joskus mukananne, kun käyte.
– Kiitos, varmasti! (TF 219.)

In the story, Dr. Finckelman is guilty: he has poisoned Ellinora, though this is quickly decided by the protagonist since he does not know how to continue. In the end, Lili and the protagonist turn the story into a joke: Lili seems to join in and pretends that she would like to meet Dr. Finckelman one day. But later, when the group starts to dance, the protagonist begins to feel alienated again (and humiliated because Lili has said that he dances like Raiski), and suddenly he grabs Lili. The narrator recollects his thoughts in the moment—or more precisely, what he seemingly was not thinking:

What was I thinking? Nothing at all, it definitely did not occur to me to strip her off her clothes and do violence to her, it did not occur to me at all.
No, that would be crazy! On the contrary, I shunned the thought, because I only wanted to squeeze her against myself, that was my purpose, only to squeeze her right and at most strangle her to death—that was all.

Mitä oikein ajattelin? En kerrassaan mitään, ei juolahtanut mieleenikään risua häntä alasti ja tehdä hänelle väkivaltaa, ei tullut mieleenikään tuo ajatus. Ei, mitä hulla! Päinvastoin minä kavahdin tuota ajatusta, sillä halusin vain puristaa häntä vasten itseäni, se oli tarkoitukseni, vain likistää oikein ja korkeintaan kuristaa hänet kuoliaaksi, ei muuta. (TF 232.)

His thoughts, through the hyperbolic denial, reveal violent urges toward Lili.
Lili bites him and is able to escape. After the incident, the protagonist is deeply embarrassed and makes up a new speech:

I am a dog, you hear, a horny dog! Hear me! I said. [...] I am the devil from the book of Revelation, hahaha… I am Finckelman, I laughed out loud to make what happened an object of a funny joke and to put the embarrassing thing out of people’s minds.

Olen koira, kuulitteko, kiimainen koira! Kuulkaa! sanoin. […] Olen Ilmestyskirjan peto, hahahaha… olen Finckelman, hohotin täyttä kurkkua tehdäseni tapahtuneen tosiaankin hauskan esineeksi ja saadakseni nolon jutun pois päiväjärjestyksestä. (TF 232.)

The club scene reveals that although the Finckelman story is a “joke” or “play” (as the protagonist will claim many times later when he is trying to defend himself), Dr. Finckelman, the protagonist’s invention, has become a part of his identity. The text maintains the possible reading of the protagonist’s actions during the party as due to him being very drunk, but his drunkenness also reveals his (unconscious) identification with Finckelman. When encouraged or pushed, the protagonist takes the doctor’s position, even at the crime scene when he introduces himself as “Dr. Finckelman”—and this is the main reason why the other characters start to suspect him. This leads us to a third interpretive path which takes us to the conclusion that the protagonist is guilty (either acting as or identifying with Dr. Finckelman) by looking at what happens after the rape.239

(3) Feelings of Guilt

239 There are also interpretations that look for answers from the intertextual connections between other novels and Tohtori Finckelman. Annamari Sarajas has suggested that just like Ivan in Brothers Karamazov manipulates his double, servant Smerdyakov, to murder his father Karamazov, also the protagonist as Dr. Finckelman (she calls the protagonist “Finckelman”) is the source of the crimes and destruction around him. In Sarajas’s reading the rapist is “Finckelman’s double, the sub-conscious of his sexual desire” (“Finckelmanin kaksoisolento, seksuaalisen himon aliminä”) who ultimately seems to be Saleva (though Sarajas’s conclusion is to some extent ambiguous) (see Sarajas 1953/1980, 72–73; also Envall 1988, 112). However, as Salin (2002, 218–219) remarks, Sarajas does not pay attention to the fact that both in Brothers Karamazov and in Tohtori Finckelman the crime remains ultimately unsolved: Smerdyakov’s guilt under Ivan’s influence is not completely certain, nor is Saleva’s under the influence of the protagonist/Dr. Finckelman. In another, more promising intertextual interpretation, Salin (2002, 217) connects Tohtori Finckelman and Svidrigailov’s plot in Crime and Punishment. In Dostoyevsky’s novel Raskolnikov’s double, Svidrigailov, has raped a small girl but the crime has been reduced into rumors. Ultimately the victim of the rape kills herself, and so does Svidrigailov after dreaming about a rape. As Salin points out, the court proceedings in the novels are very similar and in both the crime remains unsolved in the eyes of the law (Salin 2002, 217–218). If the protagonist of Tohtori Finckelman is connected to Svidrigailov, we could interpret that he is guilty although he is not convicted in the storyworld, and like Svidrigailov, who ultimately commits suicide, the narrator-protagonist has his guilt confirmed in his experiences of shattering. A third intertextual interpretation could be developed around the connection between the protagonist and Camus’s Meursault (see also Salin 2002, 142–145). The protagonist could be seen as guilty like Meursault, but under alleviating circumstances: in both novels, the crime is committed in a state of strange confusion and distress, and both characters could be regarded as non compos mentis in a just juridical system. Meursault, however, gets a higher sentence because of something he does not do (he is not able to mourn “properly” the death of his mother) and the protagonist of Tohtori Finckelman uses his institutional powers to ensure he is not convicted. Moreover, Korpela’s readers run the risk of acting like Camus’s prosecutor: charging the protagonist for his inability to feel and his attitudes without enough evidence against him concerning the rape.
The third interpretive path focuses on the events after the rape (see also Salin 2002, 206). Afterwards, the search is on for a person called “Dr. Finckelman” for the crime, the protagonist’s friends are abandoning him, and it is gradually confirmed that the protagonist and Dr. Finckelman have become one. In the same chapter, the narrator shows Dr. Finckelman speaking directly to him (just before the scene about “doctor’s business” in which the protagonist sleeps with Irma). For the first time, readers are in direct contact with Finckelman. He is now “alive,” looking at the protagonist, and the narrator reports his speech to us:

And Finckelman fingers his beard, looks at me under his brows with his horribly crooked eyes, and replies: From the day you, through the testimony of Riitu Jänkäläinen, resurrected me, I have been following you. And I shall travel with you until the end of the world, though only with the condition that you are worth my company. I just ask: is it already believed...

And I concede: you are right. And from that moment we are inseparable, I and Finckelman. Only death can us part...

And in an enormous swamp, squishy mud under our feet I spend wonderful moments with Finckelman. A sensuous celebration...

The protagonist admits here that he and Dr. Finckelman are inseparable. The narrator borrows words from the wedding vows (“Only death can us part”) and tells us that they enjoy an exhilarating “sensuous celebration” at a swamp. Dr. Finckelman is the protagonist’s invention, but as Markus Envall (1988, 113–114) lists, he is also “the culmination of the development of the miserable man”; “a life-project”; “an idealization of becoming non-human”; “a Nietzschean Übermensch”; “the Devil or its incarnation”; and finally, “a substitute for self, an ideal self, a professional role and an alter ego.”

Soon after his “union” with Dr. Finckelman, the protagonist begins to experience inexplicable feelings of distress and guilt. In Chapter 32 we learn that Lili has shot Niilas (by accident, as we learn later), he has died, and the protagonist goes through another delusional episode. This time it does not result in feelings of lightness. Everything is empty, stagnant, pulling his “world out of its place” (this passage was briefly discussed in Chapter 1):
Everything is quite strange, nothing is as it should be. It feels empty, stagnant, as if nature had had a stroke. Something has happened, I realize, something that very unpleasantly pushes its way into my life too. It is as if some kind of ropes were pulling my world off its rails. Invisible ropes. This is none of my business, nothing that has happened, I say, not at all, there’s no point in pulling... Leave me alone, I am an outsider... But still they force their way through, something keeps pulling the raft on which I am standing, although all sense says that I should have my own raft, my own world that is mine alone. The raft should absolutely belong to me alone, no one else should have anything to do with it. But no, no! Something is wrong. Something is pulling and drawing, downwards rather... I cannot stand it, I escape. I go to the land where I am my own lord and king. It is different than this here over, it is a land of Great Freedom. And Finckelman is also there.

He feels the ropes pulling him under water. He insists that he is “an outsider” but appears to be ridden with guilt: he is not free or detached from others, without responsibility. He escapes to the other land of “Great Freedom” where Finckelman is, but there he meets someone who is suddenly drowning:

Some man is walking on a road, a road that is different from all other roads. Perhaps it isn’t a road at all... It just is... He walks on it, sees nothing, notices nothing, just looks in front of him, looks and looks, peeks to the pit of nothingness, over the border, it is quiet around, as it always is in that land. So he walks, I can see him clearly. And everyone can see him, everyone who is there, they stare at the man. But he sees no one, nothing, not even the black water into which he falls without noticing. Because suddenly the road has disappeared, the ground is gone, there is only the deep water. “Help!” the man screams with a pitiful voice. But they only watch, no one raises a finger to help, they only look with their eyes that are like stone. “My goodness doesn’t anyone help a man who is drowning?” I hear myself ask all of them. “No,” they say, “here no one helps, this is how it is. But here no one burdens another, everyone is their own master.” “Help! Help!” the man howls in a horror of death. “Finckelman, help!” “I help no one. I am an educated man, I respect the human being. Everyone has a right to walk their own road.” I am horrified to hear that, it raises a sweat on my forehead, especially as I notice, to my surprise that the howling man is me. It is me!
I startle as I walk on the road. Where do these things come to my mind… My feet are strangely heavy.

Eräs mies kulkee tietä, kulkee sellaista tietä joka on erilainen kuin kaikki toiset tiet. Eikä se oikein tie olekaan … Onpahan vain … Hän kulkee sitä pitkin, ei näe mitään, ei mitään huomaa, katsoo vain eteenkään, katsoo ja katsoo, kurkistele olemattoman syvyyskyni, rajan yli, ympärillä on hiljaista kuten siinä maassa aina on. Nään hän kulkee, minä näen hänet selvästi. Ja kaikki hänet näkevät, kaikki jotka siellä ovat, he tuijottavat miestä. Mutta hän ei näe ketään, ei mitään, ei edes mustaa vettä, johon hän hoomaamaataan pulahtaa. Sillä äkkiä tie onkin poissa, maa on kadonnut, on vain syvä vesi. ”Auttakaat?” mies parkuu surkealla äänellä. Mutta he katsovat vain, kukaan ei nosta sormiaan auttaakseen, katsovat vain kivetynä silmin. ”Hyvänä aika, eikö täällä kukaan autta hukkuvaa?” minä kuulen kysyvän heiltä kaikkia. ”Ei,” he sanovat, ”täällä on nyt sellainen tapa. Mutta ei täällä kukaan painakaa toista, jokainen on täällä oma herransa.” ”Auttakaat! Auttaakaat!” se mies ulvoo kouleman kauhussa. ”Finckelman, auta!” ”En auta ketään. Olen oppinut mies, huntoin oikeus kulkea tiensä loppuun.”

Minua hirvittää kuulla, se nostaa tuskanhien otsalleni, etenkin kun ihmeekseni huomaan, että se ulvova mies olen minä. Minä itse!

Hätkähän siinä tiellä kulkiessani. Mistä ne tuollaiset tulevatkaan mieleen …

Jalkani ovat kummallisen raskaat. (TF 315–316.)

The other land is no more a good place. He realizes that “the howling” drown-ing man who gets no help from others is himself. At the end of the passage he wakes up from the hallucination/image and his feet feel “strangely heavy.” The trip to the other world appears as an allegory of his situation after the rape.

In the actual world, however, it still seems that the protagonist is on the “winning” side. Just like the protagonist’s uncle earlier, the chief physician has suddenly died, and the protagonist has become the head of the hospital. The narrator reveals this casually, as if in passing: “I was the chief physician of our hospital now, you see; the former one had died, and I was appointed to his post. It was a great honor for a young man.” He has the new position and he is becoming more and more wealthy: he sells Niilas’s (who is now dead) worthless quarry shares to Mellonen who goes bankrupt and loses his mind, and at the same time the protagonist’s own quarry at Riitu’s former cottage proves to be extremely profitable. In addition to Mellonen, also Raiski and Saleva end up in the hospital, as does Lili. In the end, Niilas’s ex-wife Irma is the only one who “survives”: “I am leaving now, she said to me sharply. […] Yes. Goodbye, Dr. Finckelman! Then she left. I was left there high and dry.” After all his other friends have ended up as his patients, the protagonist focuses on developing “humane treatments” at the hospital: “‘Treat them humanely,’ I said. I myself tried to understand them even better, for example Raiski, even Saleva…” Yet, as can be expected, the talk about “humane treatment” is soon negated as a disorder breaks: “Finally the nurses were able to calm the patients so that they were able to lock them again in their rooms.” But although he seems to be managing on some level, not everything is well: “I became more and more careful, I watched behind my back constantly, no one could surprise me.” Finckelman’s shadow seems to be following him: he is ridden with guilt.

The True Face of Dr. Finckelman

In Chapter 33 the “true face” of Doctor Finckelman is finally revealed to the protagonist himself. He hears “whispers” and sees people “plotting” around him:

There were discussions, whispers, they were plotting behind my back. And patients, nurses, even the interns pulling the same rope! This is the most devilish place where a man can be, I told myself. This is torture!

Keskusteltiin, supateltiin, selkäni takana punottiin juoninta. Ja potilaat, hoi-tajat, alilääkäritkin – kaikki saman köyden päässä kiinni! Tämä on saatannallisin paikka, missä ihminen voi olla, sanoin itselleni. Tämä on kidutusta! (TF 322.)

Once again there are two ways to interpret the scene: either the protagonist is paranoid, or the people actually are gossiping about or even plotting against him (recall Raiski, Marke, and Irma in very similar situations earlier). Both interpretations are as plausible: though Saleva is found guilty, there are still rumors about the protagonist’s guilt, and he has betrayed so many people that they might very well be scheming against him—or, he is paranoid out of guilt. The scene also mirrors another scene from the end of Part One in which the young protagonist says his goodbyes to Riitu: Riitu is in a confused, paranoid state and refuses to drink the milk the protagonist offers him, saying that it is “poisoned” (TF 102). In the epilogue, Oskari reveals to the narrator that Riitu had killed two people and lost his mind: “But this broke his mind, he was afraid of everybody. That’s the case. Sin does these things... It’s in human nature...” 245

242 “Kohdelkaa heitä inhimillisesti”, sanoin. Itse yritin heitä ymmärtää entistä paremmin, esi-merkkisi Raiskia, jopa Salevaakin…” (TF 319.)
243 “Hoitajat saivat lopulta potilaat sen verran rauhoitetuiksi, että heidät voitiin taas teljetä huoneisiinsa.” (TF 320.)
244 “Tulin entistä varovaisemmaksi, katselin yhtenään taakseni, minua ei kukaan saanut yllätťä-ťää.” (TF 321.)

The connection between Riitu and the protagonist has now come full circle.

The people’s actual or imagined whispers haunting him, the protagonist for the last time tries to take refuge in the other land. But it brings no comfort:

I escaped. I went to a land I had visited before, to the other land, where my friends were. But it was a deserted land, stood still, people frozen in their places. They stared at me with pale lips, did not say a word. What is this, I said to myself, is this appropriate even... I had been here before. Is my home not anywhere anymore? […]

“Away from here, away!” I howled in horror. “This is a cold land, the soul shivers here...”

“It is not so easy to get out of here,” he [Dr. Finckelman] replied. And they all smiled mysteriously.

He tries to escape from the other land, but Finckelman says that it is not so easy. Finally, the protagonist realizes:

So this is what Finckelman is like, I thought puzzled as I returned from there. So this is Finckelman... I sneered, wondered, tried to remember carefully what he was like. And yes, it was him, Finckelman, it really was him, there was something inexplicably familiar in him. The more I remembered, the more familiar he became. In the end he was amazingly familiar, like my own image. I flinched. I flinched furiously.

The true face of Dr. Finckelman is revealed: “it was actually me.” Here comes the final duck-rabbit illusion: the protagonist himself sees Finckelman’s face where his own should be. He has become an ambiguous image: his face belongs to Dr. Finckelman and “right here was some other man.” The “other man” or “some man” (whom we have encountered in the forest, drowning in water, in the other world, and who will appear even in the epilogue), Finckelman, and the protagonist himself are all the same.

245 “Mutta siinä se meni vialle päästään, pelkäsi kaikkia. Niin on asia. Synti teettää kaiken-laista...Se on ihmisluonnossa...” (TF 342.)

After this, the narrator recounts how he started to avoid people, afraid that they would notice that he is not himself: “I locked myself inside my apartment, I could not continue the deceitful lie with my eyes open.” He still tries to convince himself that everything is all right, but here the narrator comes to the fore and admits explicitly that he was only lying to himself, for instance in saying that he had forgotten Lili: “I have almost forgotten her, I told myself […]. But it was idle speech, I had not forgotten her. I remembered her every day, once a day, only once, but it lasted for twenty-four hours.” He starts to hear his patients shouting “Finckelman, Finckelman, Finckelman” (TF 326) and finally calls Oskari to help. Oskari comes, takes care of everything, and even makes the protagonist give Mellonen his money back. Ultimately Oskari takes the shattered protagonist back to the farm where he spends “days, weeks, years”:

Darkness, night. Life standing still. I remember, I remember, I remember nothing. I try and I try—I remember at least something.

In the epilogue, we learn how the narrator-protagonist slowly, over many years, returns from “his grave” and how he asks Oskari to bring him a pen and paper and starts to write down his story. He is visited by Simpanen who has found faith, and then by Pomila who has a message from Lili. The visitors urge him to look for a “spark of love”: “medicine that makes the madman wise.” However, old doubts haunt the narrator. In the very end, he escapes once more to the “other land”: he sees Finckelman and tries to get away from him, but then the figure turns into “some man” walking in the desert—a man we can interpret as Christ—and the narrator tries to follow him. We are told that he returns to his profession as a psychiatrist. On the final page, Lili tells him to look for a “medicine.” Even here the narrator tells his readers that Finckelman’s “shadow” is haunting him and that sometimes he “takes up the old mask.” Nonetheless, he vows to keep on looking: “Because a medicine has been invented, a healing medicine. One must look for it in the grave, finally one finds it inside one’s own

246 “Eristäydyin, sulkeuduin asuntooni, en enää avoimin silmin jaksanut kantaa tuota petolista valhetta.” (TF 323.)
247 “Olenpa melkein unohtanut hänet, puhelin itseseni aina toisinaan […]. Mutta se oli turhahaa puhetta, en ollut unohtanut. Muistin hänet joka päivä, kerran päivässä, vain kerran päivässä, mutta sitä kertaa kesti kaksikymmentaneljä tuntia.” (TF 326.)
248 “Rakkaiden kipinä. […] Se on lääke, joka tekee hullusta viisaan.” (TF 348.)
249 “[V]edän kasvoilleni vanhan naamion […]” (TF 352.)
Fictions of Madness

chest. I wish I could learn how to use it!” As many readers have noted, Korpela leaves the ending open: we never find out which side of the narrator ultimately wins, the human or Dr. Finckelman.

As Salin (2002, 219) points out, Korpela’s novel resembles many of Dostoyevsky’s works because in both the experience of guilt seems to be shared, although it is uncertain who is actually guilty of committing the criminal act. Korpela himself suggested in an interview, following Dostoyevsky: “The guilty one can be found everywhere, and everyone is as guilty.” The protagonist is punished with guilt that drives him insane and ultimately forces him to try to change his relationship to himself and to others: to look for a medicine from within. Yet, as Salin (2000, 221) notes, it remains uncertain what he is actually guilty of. We never find out for sure whether he is guilty of raping Reseda, or, in a more allegorical interpretation, of failing to help her, Lili, and himself.

As Salin writes: “The uncertainty about his crime is a greater burden to the readers than a clear certainty about his guilt. [...] The lack of resolution, in the common sense of punishment, does not negate the demand for justice. Rather it makes the guilt infinite and unreconcilable.” Korpela brought Dostoyevsky’s themes to the situation after the Second World War, and his treatment of guilt, responsibility, and reconciliation should be read in this context: the guilt is about letting things happen, letting oneself and the world be subsumed by cruelty and violence. Ultimately, the uncertainty and ambivalence that permeates the whole novel invites us to pay attention to structures that create pain and suffering: to forms of violence and abuse of power.

---

250 “Sillä lääke on keksitty, parantava lääke. Haudasta asti sitä pitää hakea, omasta rinnastaan sen lopulta löytää.” (TF 352.)
251 Annamari Sarajas (1953/1980, 61) emphasizes that Korpela leaves the two sides, “Ivan” and “Alyosha” (cold rationality vs. compassion) to fight inside the protagonist. As Salin suggests, instead of simply choosing religion over skepticism, Korpela’s novels form what Mikhail Bakhtin called “a great dialogue” in which opposing ideas meet (Salin 2002, 252). Similarly, Eino Karhu (1977, 116) observes that: “it is difficult for artist Korpela to accept a wholly religious perspective and subjugate his story as its vehicle.” (“taiteilija Korpelan on vaikea hyväksyä kokonaisuudessaan uskonnollista näkökulmaa ja alistaa kerrontaansa sen välikappaleeksi.”)
252 “Syyllinen löytyy kaikkialta, ja kaikki ovat yhtä syyllisiä.” (Quoted in Vainio 1975, 134.)
253 In this interpretation, he would feel guilty not for something he does, but rather for not doing enough. In this he could be compared to Camus’s La Chute. See also Salin 2002, 153; Vainio 1975, 133.
254 “Epävarmuus tästä on suurempi kuin varma tieto hänen syyllisyystään. [...] Ratkaisun, rangeistuksen tavanomaisessa merkityksessä, puuttuminen ei kielä oikeudenmukaisuuden vaatimusta. Pikemminkin se tekee syyllisyystä ääretöntä ja sovittamatonta.” (Salin 2002, 221.)
3.5. Reading Others and Ethics

The narrator-protagonist of Tohtori Finckelman creates his own solipsistic universe in which the others are his mirrors, projections, inventions, and hallucinations. His solipsism is quite different from what we saw in the narrator of Kaunis sielu. Whereas it is clear for the readers that the narrator of Kaunis sielu has experiences that color the world around her and she tries to imagine the experiences of the man she hates and loves, in Tohtori Finckelman the narrator’s relationship to others is more ambiguous and readers need to work harder to recognize the power the narrator has over his environment. At first sight, the narrator of Tohtori Finckelman appears less solipsistic than the narrator of Kaunis sielu: there are the other characters whose speech and sometimes even thoughts are conveyed to us, there are dialogues in which we encounter other characters. However, on a closer examination it is easy to notice that the narrator-protagonist sees what he wants in others, he makes them do what he wishes, and plays with them. As a narrator he controls their minds and characterizes them as he wants. As a psychiatrist he observes them, diagnoses them, and even feeds them ideas (for example convincing Raiski that Lili is his long-lost daughter, only to amuse himself). As Dr. Finckelman he places himself above all others and looks at them with contempt and cruelty. As Salin (2002, 177) writes:

>Korpela’s novels form a constant dialogue between encountering the other and solipsism. The protagonist of Tohtori Finckelman lives alone in the cramped world of his selfhood, he defines (and as a psychiatrist he also diagnoses) other people in ways that suit himself and despises them, washes his hands of them. At the same time, he is looking for an identity by mirroring himself to others; he is utterly dependent on others. […] Korpela’s novels force us to think about how the encountering of the other actually happens? Is it even possible? Do we encounter the other in another human being, or only a figment of our own imagination, a reflection of our own fears and hopes—a fiction?255

It becomes clear that the kind of relationship to others that the protagonist creates is not sustainable. Ultimately Reseda’s rape and Lili’s shattering force him to face his ethical responsibility to other human beings: guilt haunts him.

One part of the criticism of forms of violence in Tohtori Finckelman is directed against psychiatry as a profession and as a science with a purpose to “know” the minds of others. The problems of psychiatry are made explicit in the ironic description of the “wonderful” profession by the narrator at the beginning of Part Two, as he describes himself as a young psychiatrist who has a “goal”:

---

I was an esteemed person; I was a doctor, a nerve doctor. My goal was to study the human, to take a look at the depths of the human soul, so to speak. To have a glimpse at the endless pit. And I was quite advanced in my task, at a point where madness could be cured, if we only found a healing medicine. Oh, we knew the diagnosis! So, there was nothing more to do but to wait for that medicine and hope for the best, even to pump to others that vitalizing liquid of hope. That was my profession, mine. Others had other professions.

And the goal? To heal the sick human being. To invent a machine that would make sane those who are insane...

Was it a beautiful goal? My dear people, you know yourselves that there is something wonderful about it. You have to admit it; it’s your job to do so. And I did my best. I never missed an opportunity to try to achieve my goal. No. On the contrary, I walked the endless aisles of the mental hospital all day, all night, and every time I came into a doorway of a patient’s room, I asked kindly: How are we doing here? Thank you, we’re doing great. I continued and came to another doorway. And I said: Doing great, right? Great, great, thank you for asking. And I continued.

Sometimes we went together, the chief physician and I. Those times we asked the questions in turns. It was easier that way, and it brought some change to the patients’ monotonous lives. But the chief could not manage it every day, a person cannot manage endlessly.

Ja päämäärä? Parantaa sairas ihminen. Keksiä kone, joka tekisi viisaaksi hulun...

Joskus kävimme yhdessä, yliäläkkäri ja minä. Silloin kyselimme vuorotelten, se oli helpompa ja toi vaihtelua potilaiden yksitoikkoiseen elämään. Mutta yliäläkkäri ei jaksanut joka päivä, ihminen ei jaksaa lopputomiin. (TF 109, emphasis mine.)
Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation

Once again, the irony is clear: according to the narrator it would be extremely easy to cure madness—if only there were a cure! It is also uncertain which is more important: that the profession is esteemed and offers its practitioners wealth and power (as hinted also at the beginning of Part Two), or that its purpose is to help people. The points the narrator implicitly makes can be connected to the antipsychiatric views which were developed around the same time as Tohtori Finckelman was written: psychiatry has not been able to find a “cure” for madness; the diagnostics have been developed to the point of absurdity; mental hospitals are filled with people with no hope of recovery or of life outside the institutions; “therapy” is just hollow exchange of words. Moreover, Tohtori Finckelman as a whole points toward an idea that the people diagnosing and “treating” the illnesses are just as mentally distressed as their patients. The novel thus offers itself for an allegorical reading: a critique of psychiatry, of categorizing people, and of misogyny and abuse of power.

Paradoxically, the novel forces its readers to try to “read” and interpret the narrator’s mind, to infiltrate and reveal his hidden thoughts, to diagnose him. We are looking at him “from above” when we try to distance ourselves from him and judge him. And when we empathize with him, there is a danger of falling prey to his manipulations. The novel constantly makes the readers oscillate between the need to be able to read the minds of others and the impossibility of doing this, the ethical necessity to connect with another and understand one another, and the power relations inherent in such endeavors.

What would then be an ethical relationship between the self and another? The problem is thematized in Chapter 25 in which the characters spend the drunken evening at the club. In his monologue, Pomila presents a “theory” about the self and other. He articulates the experience of a gap between the self and other and the problems of language and speech that were brought up also by the narrator in the prologue and later by Lili when she came to meet the protagonist for the first time. Pomila tells the others:

But sometimes it feels as if we did not understand one other enough. And it is bad. It feels as if we were completely foreign to one other although we spoke the same language. It is as if we spoke a different language. But it is because—I have been thinking—because the minds are on different levels and they cannot intersect, or they are on the same level and they do intersect, so that there can already be flashes, do you understand? Unions of minds, understanding, pleasure. But it is not until they are on the same level and run parallel to one other that there can be a good feeling for a human being, a wonderful feeling. Don’t you agree?

The problem is that the minds are on different “levels” and they cannot “intersect.” Or actually they are on the same level and do intersect, and there are already “flashes,” but they should be “parallel.” The irony in Pomila’s speech is that he is drunk and does not make much sense—and at the same time he is clearly a “wise fool” who has a lucid understanding of himself, others, and the world (see also Salin 2002, 255). After his rambling speech, Raiski adds to the comicality and self-importantly declares that he had “always thought and said the same thing.” Later in the same evening, Pomila joins the protagonist at his home and continues his theories:

– [...] But there is no equation.
– Equation?
– Yes, equation. You see: a human being continuously creates a system—this we discussed already, we agreed. So! Now we would need the system of systems, the culmination of everything, what some specific person thinks, in other words the whole mental world of that person, a culmination, a concentration of his thoughts, which could be written in the form of a simple equation. So we would simplify the whole varied whole. Only a short equation! It would be as if in blazing letters always in front of my eyes—only a look at it, and the person could in everything—even in his speech—follow a clear, consistent line. What do you say? Is this good?

– [...] Mutta kun ei ole yhtälöä.
– Niin yhtälöä?

The statement becomes ironized yet again, since readers can see that Pomila’s own thoughts are far from consistent. Yet, this speech as well as the earlier one reminds us of the narrator’s wish of “cutting a piece of flesh into his every word” (TF 4). An equation would convey everything there is about a person: it would “simplify the whole varied whole” into a “blazing” clause. It would help them live “consistently.” But we can see that the dream is futile: no such equation 256 “[T]uota samaa minäkin aina olen ajatellut ja puhunut” (TF 225). Note again the similarities between the characters.

Chapter 3: A Divided Mind and Divided Interpretation could ever exist. Nonetheless, paradoxically, there is hope: Pomila suggests that Lili is a person who has such an equation.

On one level, Lili is nothing but the narrator-protagonist’s reflection, an alter ego or a figment of his imagination. She is his conscience, or the emotional, humane side of him to which he is unable to create a connection. On another level, Lili is an actual other with whom the protagonist tries to connect, whom he loves but also pushes away. The way different readers have interpreted Lili is highly interesting. Even though Pomila claims that Lili has the “equation,” that everything she is could be expressed in a few blazing letters, Lili cannot be reduced to any kind of theorem by readers and she has appeared as “contourless,” “unrealistic” and “strange” (see Sarajas 1953/1980, 71; Salin 2002, 14). In his review, Rafael Koskimies taps into Korpela’s technique in which Lili is hidden from the readers’ view. As Salin (2002, 188) also notes, it is interesting how Koskimies touches upon the ethical meaning of the technique, but doubts its aesthetic value:

She [Lili] should according to the plot be someone who deeply affects the way the events unfold, but after reading the book we know about as much or even less [about her] than when we were reading the first pages. The author has shown skill in the way he hides this person from curious gaze as perfectly as one could wish. A completely another question then is if such a blind man’s bluff is satisfying to anyone. When the narrator’s technique is developed until this point—when instead of revelation a thick curtain is drawn in front of a portrait—there is reason to ask whether this is completely legitimate.257

Lili is, in the end, an “unreadable mind” in Abbott’s (2008) terms or a Lévinasian Absolute Other, as Salin (2002, 264) describes.258 Korpela makes sure that the narrator—and because we are dependent on the narrator’s words, also readers—are unable to infiltrate Lili’s mind (as he does with other minds, both as a narrator describing their thoughts and as a psychiatrist diagnosing them and feeding ideas to them). The narrator-protagonist cannot “make sense” of Lili. But Lili moves him: she makes him reflect, feel, love, and despair. The connection and the oscillation between Lili and the narrator-protagonist lasts until the end of the novel: Lili commits a crime (by accident, we learn later) and she 258 Salin (2002, 263) connects Korpela’s works to the Lévinasian ethics of otherness. In Lévi-nas’s thought we have to encounter the other as other, not as a version of myself: the other cannot be reduced to the same (to myself) by trying to define the other or by trying to understand them. Rather, we have an infinite, a-symmetrical responsibility to one another (see Lévi-nas 1969).

too goes insane. After playing a part in destroying Lili, the protagonist, too, loses his mind. But Lili recovers: she serves her sentence, and, in the epilogue, she comes to bring the narrator back to life. We learn that the shadow of Finckelman is haunting him even at the end, but there is some hope. The narrator-protagonist and Lili are in a constant dialectical movement, pushing one another to act, and this movement also guides the plot of the story.

The other person in the novel who remains completely other, even more than Lili, and also has an important effect on the narrator-protagonist and his story, is the victim of the rape, Reseda. She is introduced at the very beginning of Part Two where the narrator describes his profession. Just before mentioning Reseda, the protagonist has complained about the stigma of half-heartedness that haunts his life. After this, the narrator describes his mood changing, the melancholy thoughts are turning into claims of indifference and (false) righteousness:

Well, one can live like this as well, I talked to myself and tried to adjust to the matter of things and live as if I had never expected anything more from life. I am anyway able to fill my place in society, and that is the main thing, I added consolingly and looked at the lovely flowers, which Reseda, one of the mentally retarded, brought to my room every day. And they were beautiful, we often admired them together, Reseda and me. The flowers are beautiful, thank you, I could say to Reseda. She stares [sic] at me as if I was a god, smiles incessantly, speaks nothing. Go on to your work, I then say.

Who is Reseda? There are again two directions for reading. Either Reseda is an actual person, a patient whom the protagonist rapes or allows to be raped, or Reseda and the protagonist are connected in some mysterious way: Reseda is a side of him that is abused and victimized. Reading this passage with all the knowledge we have, it is possible to see different warning signs in it. Once again, the tense suddenly changes in the middle of the paragraph and the past is evoked as if it were present: the narrator suddenly adapts the position of the experiencing I. The present tense evokes a sense of time standing still for a moment. Then the protagonist tells Reseda to go back to work.

The way the narrator takes the position of the experiencing I suggests that there is something we are not told. The scene creates a connection to the later scene in which Reseda also brings him flowers (after Saleva’s visit and after the protagonist has visited the “other land”). The fact that the protagonist thinks that Reseda sees him as “a god” is alarming, and the strange atmosphere is reinforced with the flower motif which is repeated throughout the novel. At the beginning of Part Two, we already know about the protagonist dreams of flowers that are his only “friends” and that he would “caress”: he would “save” them from “judgment” by cutting them and taking them into his hands (TF 10). In Part One, he has explicitly connected the police chief’s daughter to the flowers of the forest. We are here told that Reseda brings him flowers every day, and her name, Reseda, itself is a flower (like Lili). Right after this passage, as we can recall, the protagonist starts to complain that everything becomes stale, “even flowers, patients, friends, everything” (TF 112) and he brings forth Dr. Finckelman in his imagination (see 3.2).

All this together suggests that the protagonist views himself as a powerful figure, omnipotent, a god who has control over his “flowers,” the women around him. Yet, we can remember the hints, for example in the rape scene, that the protagonist himself is suffering from dissociation—that he is a victim of some kind of trauma, we just never learn exactly what this trauma is. Is he the flower—the victim of himself? We could even read the story about Riitu as more alarming, paying more attention to what the text teaches us about him, his history of violence, and how Riitu affects the young protagonist through his stories. In the epilogue, Oskari directs us to this interpretive path. The protagonist accuses him of not understanding the crimes he has committed, and Oskari explains that he is not guilty of anything. In Oskari’s eyes, it is Riitu who is the criminal:

– I’m just a simple man, but I do understand criminals. And you should believe that! But the thing is that you have been thinking too much already when you were a young boy and you spent too much time with the madman Riitu. But there is a difference between you and Riitu. Riitu had a reason to be mad… […] To be frank, he had killed two people once, Riitu I mean. But we shouldn’t talk about that, I promised to your mother. But I’m telling you now.

– Minä olen näitä tavallisia meikäläisiä, mutta kyllä minä ymmärrän rikollisia. Ja se on uskottava! Mutta se on sillä tavalla asia, että sinä olet niin paljon ajatellut tyhjää ja jo silloin poikasena liian kanssa olit sen hullun Riitun matkassa. Ero on kuitenkin sinulla ja Riitulla. Riitulla nimittäin oli syytäkin olla hullu… […] Se oli aikoinaan tappanut pari ihmistä, Riitu nimittäin; jos nimittäin asiat suoriksi puhutaan. Mutta siitä ei pitäisi puhua, jo aitisi kanssa sovittiin niin. Minä nyt kuitenkin sinulle sanon. (TF 341.)

259 This interpretation is also supported by a conversation he has with Pomila in the epilogue where he tells him: “My faith has died. It died together with love. I killed it myself.” (“Uskoni on kuollut. Se kuoli rakkauteen mukana. Minä itse sen tapoin.”) (TF 347.)
As Salin (2002, 209) suggests, Oskari frees the protagonist from Riitu’s inheritance with his words. It is clear that Riitu is in some way guilty for the protagonist’s situation, but we never learn the exact meaning of his role. What readers can be sure of is that the “inheritance” of Part One, the death of the protagonist’s parents and the inherited farm as well as the “inheritance” he receives from Riitu, ultimately shapes his life, splitting him into multiple identities: Dr. Finckelman—but also perhaps Lili, Reseda, and all the other characters.

In the end, we are left oscillating between interpretations in which the other characters are sides or doubles of the narrator-protagonist (either psychologically or metafictionally) and in which the others are actual in the storyworld, “imagined in flesh and blood” as Holappa (1952/1996, 359) wrote. The novel supports the two interpretations at the same time: there is the same amount of textual evidence for both. However, as the protagonist himself insists in his conversation about Raiski’s novel with Lili, perhaps we need to judge who is guilty and who is innocent. As Salin points out, rape brings up the questions of power and violence. It forces the readers to decide: it would be unethical not to try to find answers to what happens to Reseda. The protagonist is a fictional character and he does not exist in anyone else’s mind except the readers’: the responsibility for the interpretation is ours. (Salin 2002, 220–221.) Tohtori Finckelman is ultimately a deeply unsettling novel because it confirms the narrator-protagonist’s guilt on many levels but also leaves us to reflect on his possible innocence, even victimhood.

It is possible to empathize with the narrator and “fall prey” to his persuasions. As hinted above, the narrator uses several strategies of “bonding unreliability” (Phelan 2007, 223–224). When compared with Riitu, the narrator’s untrustworthiness appears less severe: he initially seems to learn his style of storytelling and his misogynous talk from Riitu. In the end, after the breakdown, Oskari, Simpanen (who has found faith and changed), Pomila, and Lili (who has suffered her sentence) offer the narrator a second chance and in a way “vouch” for him. Even though the narrator is unreliable, he can be seen as conveying what could be understood as “metaphorical truths” (Phelan 2007, 226): what happens to a person if he rejects a part of himself (the parts manifested by Lili and Reseda) and fails to create a connection to himself and to the people around him?

As many narratologists have stressed (Tammi 2012; also Cohn 1999, 307), unreliable narration can exist only in certain kinds of, often fictional, narratives: it requires an implied author who in one way or another signals that the narrator is unreliable. In real life, there is no “author” doing the signaling.260 Another way to look at this is to pay attention to how unreliability is developed inside the aesthetic frame. This frame protects readers from the narrator’s deceptions and moral transgressions in general, but in Tohtori Finckelman the protagonist’s misogyny and Dr. Finckelman’s ethics of being “above” all morality and all people are also constantly questioned, criticized and made ironic. The notion that there is no responsibility toward another human being is proved destructive. Readers are able to endure the ambiguity and undecidability of the novel because of the aesthetic frame: the novel has an endless number of layers, it creates an “endless dialogue,” as Salin (2002, 252) puts it. My own reading experience is that it is easy to move between the different interpretive paths the novel offers and to read the protagonist through different lenses in turns: psychological, metafictional, and feminist. This also means that the novel leaves its readers to ask questions, to participate in the “endless dialogue.”

260 In other words, unreliable narration requires a narrative design. As Tammi (2012) points out, e.g., news broadcasts don’t have a design that would make unreliable narration possible (news can, of course, be mistaken, unreliable or untrustworthy, but that is a different matter).

Tohtori Finckelman invites “difficult empathy” (Leake 2014, 175): a kind of openness to difference and understanding that is directed at figures that are morally questionable—criminals, murderers, and rapists. The protagonist grows into a man who hates women, he is perhaps a rapist, perhaps a culmination of a development into mysterious “evil,” an Übermensch. At the same time, he is an outsider, an abject hero, a person suffering from deep disconnection both to himself and to others, perhaps a victim of trauma. Korpela offers all these interpretive possibilities simultaneously. The text invites us to listen to and to remain open to someone who does not necessarily deserve our compassion and to pay attention to the normative scripts, models, and discourses that create violence and suffering. Such difficult empathy invites us to pay attention to phenomena and actions that we would not want to think about, but which nonetheless need to be thought about and understood. Ultimately, the criticism of Tohtori Finckelman is directed at violence and abuse of power, toxic forms of masculinity, norms and narratives that produce suffering and violence, and also at frames of interpretation in which others are too easily labeled as “sick” or “evil.”

Phelan (2005, 66), in turn, notes that sometimes also non-fictional memoirs can have unreliable narrators that are signaled by the implied author (as an example, he mentions Frank McCourt’s Angela’s Ashes in which the borders between non-fictional and fictional memoir become hazy). In fact, it is not entirely possible to distinguish “fictional” narrative techniques from “non-fictional” ones: once a technique has been invented, it can be used by fiction and non-fiction writers alike (ibid., 68).
CHAPTER 4

A Strange Atmosphere: Trauma and Tragedy in Tabu

Remember, God, that I called for you when I was in distress and when sorrow and tears were tearing apart my chest. [...]
God, you did not look upon me when I needed you; when I wanted to find you. You escaped from me then.
I took my heart into my own hands. With my own eyes I examined my paths; with my own lips I kissed my wounds and healed my pain. I do not want to know you, God; I do not want to see you; I do not want to love you.
With these words I leave my God...

That night, when I came from the field, I was pale, wet and smelled of hay. My hair flew in straight bundles on my shoulders. It was wet through and dripping water, and the top of my head was curlier than ever before or since, as my hair was short then, only two or three inches on the top, although otherwise it was long. Naturally, I cannot remember any of this myself, but I can imagine it now.

Sinä iltana tulin niityltä kalpeana, märkänä ja heinille tuoksuvana. Tukkani valui suoriksi oienneina kimppuina hartioille. Se oli läpikotaisin märkä ja tippui vettä ja minun päälaellani hiukset olivat silloin kippuraisemat kuin koskaan ennen tai jälkeen sen, sillä silloin tukkani oli päälaelta lyhyt; vain kaksi tai kolme tuumaa, vaikka se muualta olikin pitkä. Itse en luonnollisesti voi tätä kaikkea muistaa, mutta voin kuvitella sen nyt. (T 7–8.)

Timo K. Mukka’s second book, the novella Tabu (The Taboo, 1965) opens with a prayer which draws on the bodily and affective language of Pietist hymns and prayers: the tears are tearing the speaker’s chest apart, her lips are kissing the wounds. The prayer, however, is an inverse one and in it, the speaker abandons her God. Then she begins her story, returning to a night over twenty years earlier when she was coming home from a hayfield, pale and soaking wet. The description of her body, hair, and appearance, as well as the deixis (“that night”) guide the readers’ first steps in the storyworld and create anticipation: something has happened, and we are about to learn what. As discussed in Chapter 1, Tabu is a story about a thirteen-year-old girl, Milka, who falls in love with an adult man, not knowing that he is also having an affair with her mother, and becomes pregnant. Ultimately we are shown how both the girl and her mother lose their minds.

The novella has previously mainly been read through the different mythical structures in the background of the story. The title, “the taboo,” refers to what is prohibited in a society or a community—sacred and repulsive at the same time. For example, in Leena Mäkelä-Marttinen’s psychoanalytical reading, the relationship between the man and the girl breaks the taboo against incest, and Milka and her mother are punished for their transgression with madness: they become “embodiments” of the “sacred horror” of the taboo (Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 192; 194; 207). Mukka himself explained the story as a profane interpretation or a “rewriting” of the holy family. This is visible already in the characters’ names. Milka means “Queen” in Hebrew, which in the Laestadian discourse refers to “the bride of Christ” and the Virgin Mary (see Lahtinen 2013, 64); Milka’s mother Anna is the mother of Mary; and the man who abuses Milka is called “Kristus-Perkele,” “the Christ-Devil,” by the people of the village. The three protagonists are interwoven with Christian and Pietist imagery and symbols, which Mukka knew well having grown up immersed in the Laestadian culture. According to Mukka, the story reveals how “a myth is born”: it dismantles the religious story of the virgin birth (see Lahtinen 2013, 64; also Paasilinna 1988, 74; 76). Readers have also paid attention to the realist and naturalist elements of the story: for example, one of the early readers, professor of literature Aatos Ojala, wrote a statement at the publisher’s request in which he connected the story to the naturalist motif of a “fallen woman” and defended Mukka’s treatment of “mysteries of life” against an anticipated public outrage (quoted in Lahtinen 2013, 77–78).

However, the readings based on the mythical structures, generic frames, symbols, and intertexts have not so far paid sufficient attention to the sexual abuse that happens in the story. In this chapter, I read the novella partly against the previous interpretations—including Mukka’s own—and argue that Tabu is a story about sexual abuse, trauma, and their effects on the person and the interpersonal world. The mythical structures are there, but I suggest that they interfere with the reading of the text as a story about abuse and direct readers toward interpretations which focus solely on the novella’s aesthetic qualities and on the many symbols, allusions, and intertexts that can be found in it. In addition to exploring the symbolic and allegorical levels of the novella, it is important to stay on the “surface”: to look at the text, the events and the narration, the bodily language, the description of the characters’ affective and bodily experiences, the interaction between the characters and their experiential worlds, and the way the characters’ experiences are shaped by the myths and taboos, and the cultural and religious narratives surrounding them. In other words, I pay attention to the mythical and symbolic elements of the text but try to look at them from a critical distance, paying attention to the ways the text solicits readers’ bodily and affective responses and to the cultural work that different narratives and myths do in the text.

---

261 On “fallen women” in Finnish naturalism, see, e.g., Lappalainen 2008.

Like Tohtori Finckelman, Tabu simultaneously directs its readers toward different, conflicting interpretations: a mythical narrative or a naturalist description of female sexuality, a love story or a story of abuse, a story about mythical madness or sexual trauma. And yet, like Tohtori Finckelman, it also invites its readers to acknowledge the violence and the experiences of pain and suffering at the core of the story—if not because of the events themselves, at least because the characters are shattered one after the other. In what follows, I trace the different interpretive paths and discuss the ways the ambiguity of the story is connected to the “strange” overall atmosphere of the text, which, I argue, is tightly connected to the themes of sexual abuse and trauma. By “strange atmosphere,” I refer to the particular mood or affect of the novella which is difficult to define but reported by many readers, and closely connected to the style of the text.262

This has been captured by Rauni Mollberg in his film adaptation Milka (1981) and enacted in the scenography, in the foggy and surreal landscapes of the movie. According to the poet Pentti Saaritsa, there is something “almost medieval in the atmosphere of the text” (quoted in Paasilinna 1988, 91). Mukka himself wrote that he aimed at creating a “melancholy impression” (ibid., 77). Erno Paasilinna lists how different early reviewers described the novella: they wrote about “the lyrical and beautiful rhythm of the style,” “the sensitivity of the description,” and “the mythical sphere of the events which are remote and detached from everyday reality.”263 Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 189), likewise, describes the atmosphere and the style of the novella as “dream-like,” “lyrical,” “tragic,” “strange,” “archaic,” “romantic,” and “distancing.” Despite Tabu’s

---

262 The reviewers and critics often talk about the “atmosphere” and the “style” interchangeably. I would suggest that “style” is best understood as one of the sources of the “strange atmosphere.”

263 “Tyylin lyyrisen kaunis poljento, kuvauksen herkkyys, tapahtumien etäinen ja arkitodellisuudesta irrotettu myyttinen kehä.” (Paasilinna 1988, 91.) Paasilinna (ibid.) also suspects that these elements contributed to fact that the accusations of blasphemy and indecency were not as severe as they were in the reception of Maa on syntinen laulu earlier—although there were also some attacks on Tabu (see also Lahtinen 2013, 77).
connections to the naturalist tradition, the readers agree that there is something mystical, surreal and ineffable in it. I suggest that in addition to the mythical framework, the strange atmosphere can be traced to the prayers which are embedded in the story and which frame Milka’s storytelling, to the evocative descriptions of embodiment and affects (the “sensitivity of description” in Paasiliinna’s list), to the ways the characters misunderstand one another and themselves and to the strange and unexplained acts and decisions they make, and ultimately to the way the experiences of suffering and “madness” spread in the village community.

The narrative situation of the novella is one clear source for the multiple possible directions for reading and interpreting the text. The narrator’s recollections of the events are fallible, as we learn at the beginning when the narrator states that “Naturally, I cannot remember any of this myself, but I can imagine it now.” The prayer at the very beginning with its corporeal imagery (the wound, the tears) evokes experiences of pain and suffering, and implies that the narrator’s mental state is unstable at the time of narration: she addresses her words to God, accuses him of turning away from her when she was in distress and sorrow, and states that she now abandons him. The following events are mostly depicted from Milka’s perspective at the ages of thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen. There is something “childlike” and “naïve” in the way the story is narrated, as Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 194) has noted. The narrator hardly ever evaluates or reflects on what happens, but rather adopts the perspective of her young self who constantly, tragically misinterprets the events around her: she does not know enough to be able to understand the actions of the adults close to her, whereas the readers likely do. When read through the mythical frame, she also seems to be guided by different sexual and social taboos of which she is not consciously aware. The narrator describes in detail the material environment, Milka’s body and her bodily sensations, feelings, and emotions but does not explain them at all, leaving their meaning unarticulated. This is visible from the beginning, in the description of the rain, the wet body, the hair, and the smell of hay.

264 In Phelan’s terms, Mukka creates a case of “restricted narration”: “narration that records events but does not interpret or evaluate them” (Phelan 2005, 29). The situation is similar to Tohtori Finckelman, but in Tabu, we learn even less about the time of narration and about the narrator after the events.

265 In this sense, the narrative style is very different from Tohtori Finckelman in which we (almost) only have the “inner” world of the narrator and nothing “outside” him is described. Both styles of narration are highly subjective, but in Tabu, there is no reflection on Milka’s experiential world—it just “is there.” This is one reason why the text invites symbolic readings: readers begin to look for “depth” when it is not provided for us in the text.
Readers are thus left with the sensory details and with the experiential, fallible perspective through which the storyworld is constructed—and with the mythical and religious meanings which can be read into almost everything that is told. The narrative is, in other words, extremely thick, saturated with symbolic meaning, but this may distract us from recognizing or acknowledging the abuse in the story. The events themselves are likely to be understood as traumatic by many twenty-first-century readers, but the narrator never names them as such.\(^\text{266}\) There is even uncertainty about the events as the other characters ultimately seem to believe in Milka’s “Immaculate Conception.” As Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 200) points out, readers may be “puzzled” when faced with the “possibility of a miracle.” However, as I argue, we do know what has actually happened.\(^\text{267}\)

In the following, I read \(\text{Tabu}\) from the perspective of the bodily experiences, affects, and intersubjective engagements depicted in the text and discuss the way Mukka constructs Milka’s experiential world. In this reading, \(\text{Tabu}\) is a story about abuse and trauma, and the scenes depicting sexual acts are read as descriptions of sexual violence although Milka does not name them as such. Then, I discuss how the characters and their experiences are constructed by relying on literary conventions of tragedy and on mythical frames. I begin the analysis by looking at the first chapters of the novella and the narrative techniques which invite bodily and affective responses in readers: how the narrative situation (in which the adult Milka narrates past events) is constructed, how the events unfold from the readers’ perspective, how young Milka (mis)interprets Kristus-Perkele’s actions, and how the readers are invited to interpret the events and Kristus-Perkele “behind” Milka’s back. After the close reading of these basic intersubjective, interaffective, and intercorporeal relations and how they go awry, the second section turns to the tragedy form which creates both symbolic and affective meaning. I look at the tragic motifs of \(\text{hamartia}\) (Milka’s and Anna’s tragic mistakes and Anna’s \(\text{hybris}\)), \(\text{anagnorisis}\) (the characters’ gradual recognition of what is happening), and \(\text{peripeteia}\) (the turning point of the story in which Milka’s pregnancy is revealed and Kristus-Perkele escapes), as well as the different mythical and religious symbols and allusions. In the third section, I discuss the interpersonal nature of the “madness” constructed in the text: the way all the main characters are shattered one after another and how the trauma depicted in \(\text{Tabu}\) resonates with the phenomenological understanding of interpersonal trauma which results in an all-enveloping sense of uncertainty and loss of trust in the shared world (see Ratcliffe 2017; also Herman 1992). I hope that \(^{266}\) Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008) writes about trauma in \(\text{Tabu}\) but leaves the question of abuse mostly aside (she mentions abuse once and pedophilia once briefly, see ibid. 187; 223).

\(^{267}\) Mukka’s own comments also suggest that his idea was that there is no “miracle”; the myths of the Immaculate Conception and the virgin birth are dismantled because the readers know the truth about what happens.
this will show also the mythical and tragic interpretations in a new light. In the final section, I return to the question of the strange atmosphere, its sources and effects on the readers, and elaborate on the difficult ethical questions raised by the novella.

4.1. Reading Experiences of Abuse and Trauma

Before looking at the narrative situation and the portrayal of abuse in the text, a few words about traumatic experiences are in order. Trauma, from the ancient Greek word traûma for “wound” or “injury,” is often understood as the shattering of a person’s ability to survive an event or a series of events (see, e.g., Caruth 1995, 4; 1996, 4). Traumatic experiences are characterized by a difficulty to integrate them into one’s life story and to put them into words; they are unsayable, close to impossible to represent or narrate. They break down the boundaries of “mental” and “physical,” “inner” and “outer.” Trauma may manifest as involuntary flashbacks or memories, or in body memory, as an inability to move or act in the world and as “blind spots” in day-to-day living (see Caruth 1995; Fuchs 2012). As such, traumatic experiences are like wounds that are not visible in or on the body, but enacted in a person’s bodily experiences, actions, and movement in the world. Such experiences are also social and inter-subjective. Trauma affects a person’s intersubjective engagements, and traumas inflicted by other people are often more damaging than those in which nobody else is involved: they shatter a person’s trust in the shared intersubjective world (Ratcliffe 2017, 114; 118; see also Herman 1992, 51–54). Trauma affects the way a person relates to other people and the world, and it can be manifested in the way one is able to move in the intersubjective world and in physical spaces or engage with other people (Fuchs 2012, 69–70). Traumatic experiences thus diminish a person’s ability to see possibilities for action in the world: they create “a sense of a foreshortened future,” a feeling that the future is “bereft of positive, meaningful life events” (Ratcliffe 2017, 116–117). Finally, trauma can also travel in time and space: from one person to another and even over generations—I suggest that this happens in Tabu.

Traumatic experiences raise multiple ethical questions for readers. How can we recognize and acknowledge testimonies of trauma? How should we listen to traumatic experiences? We can recall what LaCapra (1999, 699) calls empathic unsettlement: “a kind of virtual experience through which one puts oneself in the other’s position while recognizing the difference of that position and hence not taking the other’s place.” Or as Sara Ahmed writes, following Cathy Caruth: “Our task […] is to learn how to hear what is impossible.” (Ahmed 2004, 35; see also Caruth 1995, 10.) This is especially important when reading a text like Tabu in which the narrator describes experiences of pain and shattering and events that can be understood as traumatic but does not name them as such. Let us now look at how the first events of the story are narrated and how Milka, Anna, and Kristus-Perkele are introduced.

The Intersubjective Bond: Milka and Anna

The first paragraphs of the novella lay the ground for the readers’ affective and bodily empathy for Milka and her mother. As we saw, adult Milka begins the story of her past with a detailed description of how, as a thirteen-year-old girl, she came home from the hayfield pale and soaking wet. The scene continues with a portrayal of Anna, who is waiting for her at home worried. Let us look again at the first paragraph in relation to the second:

That night when I came back from the field I was pale, wet and fragrant of hay. My hair flew in straight bundles on my shoulders. It was wet through and dripping water, and the top of my head was curlier than ever before or since, as it was short then: only two or three inches, although otherwise the hair was long. Naturally, I cannot remember any of this myself, but I can imagine it now.

Yet I remember my mother’s gaze from that night. She had been alarmed, because I had stayed in the field for so long, even after the rain had started. She had been about to come after me. She looked at me sternly, standing next to the table, fumbling the corner of the cloth, but I saw that she was happy that I had not lost my way.

Sinä iltana tulin niityltä kalpeana, märkänä ja heinille tuoksuvana. Tukkani valui suoriksi oienneina kimppuina hartioille. Se oli läpikotaisin märkä ja tippui vettä ja minun pääläellani hiukset olivat silloin kippuraismmat kuin koskaan ennen tai jälkeen sen, sillä silloin tukkani oli pääläeltä lyhyt; vain kaksi tai kolme tuumaa, vaikka se muualta olikin pitkä. Itse en luonnollisesti voi tätä kaikkea muistaa, mutta voin kuvitella sen nyt.

Äitini katseen sentään muistan siitä illasta. Hän oli ollut hätääntynyt, koska olin viipynyt niityllä vielä pitkään sateen alettua. Hän oli ollut jo lähössä minua vastaan. Hän katsoi minua ankarana, seisoin pöydän ääressä, sormillaan liinan kulmaa hypistellen, mutta aavistin hänen kasvoillaan kuitenkin ilon siitä, etten ollut eksynyt. (T 7–8.)

The second paragraph turns from the description of Milka’s body to her mother’s gaze, which she says she still remembers. The narrative structure is quite complex. In the first paragraph, the first-person narrator recounts something she says that she does not actually remember but tries to imagine. It could even be argued that the description is from the perspective of the mother: narrator-Milka adopts her mother’s gaze and imagines what Anna saw and what it was like for her to be worried about her daughter, and then see her coming home in the rain, soaking wet. In the second paragraph, narrator-Milka adopts the perspective of her young self observing her mother: Anna’s stern look when she is waiting, her fingers fumbling the cloth and also the inkling of joy and relief on her face when Milka arrives. Through this intermingling of perspectives, we learn about the connection between mother and daughter which will become one of the central motifs of the novella.\textsuperscript{268} Despite the stern look, Milka knows that her mother is glad that she is back, although Anna does not say anything. Almost nothing happens in the scene but when we read closely, we can recognize the subtle description of intersubjective relations and bodily engagement. In our day-to-day interactions, we usually do not have to infer what others are thinking or feeling. Rather, we effortlessly perceive others’ experiences and emotions from their bodily expressions and from the worldly contexts and narratives we share (see Gallagher & Zahavi 2012, 213; 215). This is how Milka perceives her mother’s relief from her face although nothing is said. There is a connection between daughter and mother: they easily recognize what the other is experiencing, although they do not know everything about each other. The readers, however, have experiential (affective and bodily), cultural, and social knowledge about similar forms of intersubjective engagement, and about the care and love between mothers and daughters. The description of the mother’s worry and relief is likely to evoke affective resonance in most readers, and by directing us to identify with the mother’s perspective, the text also leads us to empathize with young Milka and to worry about her. However, the scene also emphasizes its own fictitiousness: the narrator makes explicit that she has to imagine the scene, and her power as a narrator is to adopt the mother’s perspective and imagine how Anna saw her when she came home.

What ultimately makes the scene tragic is that we soon learn that the mother’s relief is misguided. She has reason to worry; she just does not know it yet. Milka carries something in her hand and refuses to show it to Anna: “I did not open my fist. Instead, I started to cry.”\textsuperscript{269} This is the first hint that something is wrong. Anna tries to comfort Milka, and when the daughter still refuses to show what she has in her hand, she finally decides to leave the matter at that: “– Just keep it, keep it, little Milka, if it is so dear to you... and come to sleep soon.”\textsuperscript{270} We are told all this before we learn what has happened: the events of the day are narrated in reverse in the first chapter, creating suspense. As suggested earlier, the very first words of the story, “that night,” point to the fact that something significant (and worth telling) has happened. Right after this scene, the character of Kristus-Perkele is introduced and we learn about the events of the day.

\textsuperscript{268} From a psychoanalytical perspective, the connection between Milka and Anna at the beginning of the novella appears as “symbiotic,” as Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 196) aptly notes.

\textsuperscript{269} \textit{”Minä en avannut nyrkkiäni, vaan purskahdin itkuun.”} (T 8.)

\textsuperscript{270} \textit{”– Pidä se, pidä pois, pikku Milka, jos se on noin sinulle rakas... ja tule kohta nukkumaan.”} (T 8.)

Reading the Christ/Devil

After the short prelude, narrator-Milka begins her story about the day by situating us in time and place: “Now it has been more than twenty years.” She recounts that it was haymaking time: she remembers how the warm air was “shimmering” and they were in the field. Kristus-Perkele is introduced through his engagement with Milka and Anna. They are singing together: “We drank sour milk by the ditch and I sang with Kristus-Perkele. Also mother sang sometimes, because the man had a beautiful voice and he knew many songs. Most of them were actually dirty shanties, but some also devotional hymns.” Looking closely at the way Kristus-Perkele is characterized throughout the first chapter, various allusions to dividedness emerge: after the singing we learn the story that his name, Kristus-Perkele (‘Christ-Devil’), was given to him by the villagers because “years ago he had the habit of cursing every other word […] And he got to keep his name although he nowadays did not utter a curse word even by accident.” The man’s surname is Ojanen (we never learn the first name), but only Anna uses it in the novella; Milka always calls him Kristus-Perkele or even “Kristus” (Christ). We then learn that Kristus-Perkele lives in a cottage built by “some half-mad man” on the edge of the village. He makes brooms, buckets, sledges, and “everything one can imagine that can be made of wood with skillful hands.” Later it is revealed that the villagers’ opinion of the man is divided:
some people “treat him like a relative,” some say “many bad things” about him. These characteristics, the doubled name, the songs which are pious yet 271 “Nyt siitä on kulunut yli kaksikymmentä vuotta.” (T 9.)

272 On the meanings of the changing seasons in the novel—the time of growth, fertility and pregnancy—and their connection to the ballad form, see Lahtinen 2013, 67.
273 “Joimme piimää ojanpientareella ja minä lauloin Kristus-Perkeleen kanssa. Äitikin lauloi joskus, sillä miehellä oli hyvä ääni ja hän osasi paljon lauluja, joista suuri osa oli kyllä rumia renkutuksia, mutta osa myös harrasmielisiä virsiä.” (T 9.) 274 “Useat naiset sanoivat häntä Ojaseksi, mikä olikin hänen oikea nimensisä, mutta koska hänellä vuosia sitten oli ollut tapana puhuessaan kiroilla joka toinen sana, oli häntä ruvettu kutsumaan Kristus-Perkeleeksi. Ja vaikka hän nykyisin ei sanonut kirossaan vahingossakaan, sai hän säilyttää nimensä.” (T 9–10.)
275 “Hän asui kylän laidassa, maantiestä puolen kilometrin päässä mökissä, jonka joku puoli-hullu mies oli rakentanut ja joka hänen kuolemansa jälkeen oli ollut autio, kunnes Kristus-Per-kele oli tullut kylään ja asettunut sinne.” (T 10.)
276 “Hän teki luutia, vihtoja, saaveja ja rekii, kelkkoja, ja kaikkea mitä saattoi kuvitella puusta syntyvän taitavan kässissä.” (T 10.)
277 “miehen, jota toiset kyläläiset kohtelivat kuin sukulaistaan ja josta toiset puhuivat paljon pahaa” (T 24).
sexual, and the villagers’ mixed views of him, create an impression of his doubled nature. Furthermore, as the narrator describes the man’s handsome looks and skills, she mentions that his moods often changed: “He was a tall, dark man who had a black stubble on his weather-beaten face and small, brown eyes that were laughing or grave—just like he himself wanted them to be.” At first, these appear as innocent, small remarks; the descriptions become meaningful only later.

After the introduction of Kristus-Perkele, a key scene of the novella is narrated. We learn what has happened at the hayfield: a sexual act between the man and the young girl. Anna has left the field and Milka is alone with Kristus-Perkele. Milka is playing with the man and sits on his lap:

Then I sat beside him, I went to sit on his lap and whispered in his ears. He took my small hands into his own, they disappeared completely inside his big palms. With a fearful look in his eyes he caressed me. My head, my legs, my knees—he touched my bottom, turning his fingers soft. He caressed me everywhere, and even if he had not done it, I felt that I loved him with all my heart and I myself also caressed his chest and neck.

– Milka... little Milka, he moaned repeatedly with his voice trembling. Pity filled me and I comforted him:

– Kristus [Christ]... Do not be sad. I will always remember you. You know that there is no one I love more than you, I said.

Yes, I was sitting beside him, I went to sit on his lap and whispered in his ear. He took my small hands into his own; they disappeared completely inside his big palms. With a fearful look in his eyes he caressed me. My head, my legs, my knees—he touched my bottom, turning his fingers soft. He caressed me everywhere, and even if he had not done it, I felt that I loved him with all my heart and I myself also caressed his chest and neck.

– Milka... little Milka, he moaned repeatedly with his voice trembling. Pity filled me and I comforted him:

– Kristus [Christ]... Do not be sad. I will always remember you. You know that there is no one I love more than you, I said.

The narrator describes in detail the encounter between the girl and Kristus-Perkele. He then undresses her and ejaculates on her stomach. If we pay attention to the characters involved, the sexual content of the scene creates a disturbing effect: the focalizing, experiencing character is a thirteen-year-old girl who 278 As Lahtinen (2013, 64) points out, the name brings together a God-figure who is “born of a virgin” and the Devil “who has seduced the man from the state of nature.” Kristus-Perkele’s woodwork can also be read as an allusion to Christ as a carpenter—or to Joseph. Further, Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 187) connects the way Kristus-Perkele shapes wood to God and the Devil shaping human beings: he also begins to shape Milka as his bride.

---

279 “Hän oli pitkä, mustaverinen mies, jolla oli musta parransänki ahavanpuremilla kasvoillaan ja pienet, ruskeat silmät, jotka nauroivat tai olivat toiset, ihan niin kuin hän itse halusi.” (T 10.)
interprets her own feeling of (sexual) pleasure as love and the man’s fearful look, gestures, and trembling voice as an expression of sadness: she feels “pity” for the man and wants to comfort him. Also notable here (as well as later) is that the girl calls Kristus-Perkele “Christ” and actively seeks his attention. The text manipulates its readers to move between young Milka’s experiential perspective and a more knowledgeable, adult perspective which includes knowledge about sexual abuse and power relations, as well as cultural and literary awareness of other stories like this. The narrator, adult Milka, stays completely in the background and offers no guidance for the readers, only reporting the actions, perceptions, bodily experiences, thoughts, and emotions of her past self and the ways she read Kristus-Perkele’s expressions.

Even though the narration focuses on the bodies, bodily expressions, and movements, and we are guided by young Milka’s interpretations, readers are likely to attribute motivations and thoughts to Kristus-Perkele based on knowledge that young Milka does not have. The text guides us to suspect that Milka (as a thirteen-year-old girl) is misreading Kristus-Perkele: readers probably interpret the man’s “fearful” look and “trembling” voice differently than her. Where Milka perceives sadness, a reader who interprets the scene as a beginning of sexual abuse sees Kristus-Perkele’s fear of being caught and perhaps shame or guilt, and even an effort to stop himself.

Even though the narration focuses on the bodies, bodily expressions, and movements, and we are guided by young Milka’s interpretations, readers are likely to attribute motivations and thoughts to Kristus-Perkele based on knowledge that young Milka does not have. The text guides us to suspect that Milka (as a thirteen-year-old girl) is misreading Kristus-Perkele: readers probably interpret the man’s “fearful” look and “trembling” voice differently than her. Where Milka perceives sadness, a reader who interprets the scene as a beginning of sexual abuse sees Kristus-Perkele’s fear of being caught and perhaps shame or guilt, and even an effort to stop himself.

---

280 I use the words “read” and “misread” when describing the way Milka spontaneously understands Kristus-Perkele’s expressions, but as Hutto (2009; also Gallagher & Zahavi 2012) has noted, the notion of “mind-reading” or “reading other minds” which is used in cognitive studies and often in cognitive narratology (e.g., Zunshine 2006; Palmer 2004; 2010; 2011) can be misleading. Minds are not “read” in real life: rather we perceive others’ experiences in their bodily expressions and actions, and only in puzzling cases try to “read,” interpret or infer their thoughts. In Milka’s case, there is no conscious reflection or interpretation, she effortlessly engages with Kristus-Perkele, and the tragedy that develops is partly dependent on the fact that her spontaneous understanding of him proves misguided.

281 However, e.g., Lahtinen describes the scene as a “daring play” between Milka and the man and, following the early reception which connected Tabu to Lolita, calls Milka a “seductive figure” (Lahtinen 2013, 67; 70; see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 222). He reads the sexual act between the man and the young girl as “an encounter between the earth and the sky,” as the man ejaculates on Milka’s stomach and the rain begins (Lahtinen 2013, 66). It seems that these symbols and intertexts, as well as Milka’s connection to “bride of Christ,” leads him to read Kristus-Perkele and Milka as “lovers” and the relationship between them as a “love affair” (ibid., 64), missing the abuse. Mäkelä-Marttinen, on the other hand, pays attention to the hayfield as the scene of the sexual encounters: they happen “in the border area between civilization and nature. The outside space brings to the scene an element of primitivity which abolishes the laws of culture and humans.” (“E]nsimmäinen seksuaaliakti tapahtuu heinäpel­lolla, sivilisaation ja luonnon raja­alueella. Ulkotila tuo kohtaukseen sivistyksen ja ihmisten lait riisuvaa alkukanta­isuutta.”) (Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 213.) Both interpretations thus ignore the sexual abuse, which Kristus-Perkele nonetheless seems to recognize. To be fair, elsewhere Mäkelä-Marttinen does refer to Kristus-Perkele’s behavior as abuse and mentions his “deceitfulness” and “weakness of the will” (ibid., 187). The interpretations are good examples of how difficult it is to try to combine the reading of the text as a story about abuse and the mythical interpretation: in the mythical frame, the abuse is easily ignored and the representation of Milka is easy to discuss in a problematic, uncritical tone—it is forgotten that she is thirteen years old.
As discussed, in real life we mostly understand others through their bodily expressions, gestures, actions and the worlds and stories we share. However, if we do not share mutual worlds and narratives, the intersubjective communication is easily shattered. In Milka’s encounter with Kristus-Perkele, much of this very basic intersubjective engagement goes wrong: Milka does not have sufficient means to understand Kristus-Perkele. She misreads his bodily expressions and seems to rely on an “innocent” cultural narrative about love when she interprets his actions. There is even a discrepancy between what she is described as feeling and what we can understand that she is feeling: she misreads her own sexual experience as love. Readers are, in other words, invited to follow how Milka’s intersubjective understanding fails in her encounter with the man. This is tragic and at the same time psychologically convincing: Milka is a thirteen-year-old girl who does not know much about the adult world, sex, or even her own body. As other readers have described, she is “innocent” and “naive” (Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 194–195). At the same time, twenty-first-century readers can see that this is how abuse often happens: a power relation and lack of knowledge prevents the victim from recognizing the abuse at first and makes them unable to express their experience to others—there might be no language for it, and it may be considered as taboo.

After the sexual act, Kristus-Perkele leaves the girl at the hayfield, naked, and “[…] the rain suddenly began. That is when he left, crying. I could see it from his back, from the way it was quivering. I stood there without my pants and my skirt, the rain pouring over me. Kristus-Perkele walked his shoulders bowed, ashamed.” 282 Again Milka is perceiving the man’s experiences in his bodily movements: the narrator describes how she saw from his back that he was crying—and the distressing atmosphere gets a symbolic manifestation in the text as it suddenly starts to rain heavily. 283 Next we are told that the man returns and tells her to go home: “Put the skirt back on… go home. Your mother must be waiting for you… quickly!” 284 Milka identifies with the distress she recognizes in the man’s expressions and gestures: “He did not look at me but past me somewhere. Then I felt how my heart became sick and desperate and I would have wanted to cry. … Shame was burning in my mind as well.” 285 Even though Milka does not seem to understand the reasons for the shame the man appears

282 “kunnes yhtäkkiä sade alkoi. Silloin hän lähti, nyyhkyttäen mennessään – näin sen hänen selästään; sen rajuista nytkähtelyistä. Minä seisoin houssulta ja hameetta sateen valuessa ylitseni. Kristus-Perkele kulki hartiat kumartuneina, häpeissään.” (T 12.)
283 Lahtinen (2013, 66), in turn, interprets the rain as a symbol of the ejaculation. See also note 281.
284 “– Pane hame päällesi… mene kotiin. Äitisi varmaan odottaa siuna… hopeaistit!” (T 12.)
285 “Hän ei katsonut minuun, vaan jonnekin ohitseni. Silloin tunsin sydämeni kipeäksi ja sairaaksi ja olisin halunnut itkeä. Vedin housut jalkaani, panin hameen ylleni ja käännyin hänestä poispäin lähteäkseni menemään. Häpeä poltti minunkin miettiä.” (T 12–13.)
to experiencing, the emotion is contagious and she is overwhelmed by it. We are then told how the man gives her a silver coin and she runs home (where she first keeps the coin sealed inside her fist and then hides it in the crack in the wall, as we are told before the events at the hayfield are narrated).

It may be difficult for the readers to recognize the sexual abuse in the story because our view of Kristus-Perkele is always colored by the perspective of young Milka. The illusion of “direct” access to his mind is offered only through short segments of quoted speech. When Milka later tells Kristus-Perkele that she wants to become his wife, the man gives an elliptic answer:

Little Milka, you are so young... too young to marry me. You are not even allowed to marry for the next five, six years... by then you will have changed your mind. You will find another, good man. You will understand when you become a woman. And even if your mind would not change, I do not want you. I will live like I have lived until now... unmarried. It is best for me like this...

Pikku-Milka, sinä olet niin nuori... liian nuori mennäksesi naimisiin kanssani. Et vielä viitteen, kuuteen vuoteen edes pääse avioliittoon... siihen mennessä mielesi kyllä muuttuu. Löydät toisen, hyvän miehen. Ymmärrät sen kyllä kunhan kehtyt naiseksi. Ja vaikka mielesi ei muutuisikaan en minä sinua halua. Minä elän niin kuin olen elänyt tähän asti... naimattoman. Nään on minulle parasta... (T 21–22.)

What is most revealing in Kristus-Perkele’s speech, is his choice of words and the gaps in his speech: “another, good man”; “live like I have lived until now... unmarried”; “It is best for me like this...” For reasons that are not revealed, Kristus-Perkele sees himself as bad, or at least as not good enough for Milka. For reasons that are not revealed, Kristus-Perkele sees himself as bad, or at least as not good enough for Milka. It is better that he does not marry: he leads a life that is not suitable for marriage. What this life is, is not revealed to us, and everything he says is filtered through Milka’s perspective.

Because of Kristus-Perkele’s actions and because so much about him is left in the dark, readers are invited to attribute mental states, thoughts, feelings, and motives to the man. He could be called a “flat” character, and he is to some extent “unreadable.” While Milka (and later also Anna) continues to dream about marrying him, readers can either follow her and begin to read the text as 286 We can also recall here the villagers’ dividedness about Kristus Perkele. Later when Kristus-Perkele has escaped from the village, the villagers continue talking: “The people told evil rumors about Kristus-Perkele: he had done other things too, he had an evil soul. Such horrible eyes even! The old women whispered.” (“Ihmiset juorusivat paljon pahaa Kristus-Perkeleestä: hän oli tehnyt muuttakin, oli sielultaan paha juuriaan myöten. Miten pahat silmätkin! Kuiskivat mummot.”) (T 67.) But it is not revealed what else he has done, except stolen a horse. The villagers’ talk could simply be “evil rumors,” but read in the frame of abuse, it could be interpreted as warning: gossip is often used to guard moral and ethical codes, and some of the people who spread the rumors could know about Kristus-Perkele abusing other children—but there is nothing in the text to prove this, only hints.

---

a love story, or resort to other interpretive frames. We can draw from folk psychology, psychological theories, and our knowledge of sexual abuse. Or we can read him through literary frames: he appears in the storyworld as a stranger or outsider who interrupts Milka’s and Anna’s intersubjective bond (see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 197).

After the first encounter between Milka and the man has been introduced, a careful reader may notice that his doubled, depressed nature is regularly emphasized in the text. The narrator reports a disturbing, self-destructive monologue in which Kristus-Perkele talks about Milka bringing flowers to his grave after his death:

...I wish you were my girl, Milka. I would sing beautiful songs for you. I would make you a cradle and put you to sleep, I would rock you to sleep every night... you would feel good all the time, you would always remember me when I had died... [...] You would bring flowers to my grave, little Milka. You would cry for me...

...olisitpa sinä minun tyttöni, Milka. Laulaisin sinulle kauniita lauluja. Te-kisin kehdon ja liekuttaisin siinä sinun tuhkurumaan, tuudittelisin joka ilta... sinun olisi hyvä mieli aina, aina muistelisit minua kun olisin kuollut sitten... [...] Toisit kukkia haudalleni, pikkuk Milka. Itkisit minua... (T 32.)

It becomes clear that Kristus-Perkele is on one level taking the place of Milka’s deceased father (see also Lahtinen 2013, 65); on another he becomes her abuser and “lover.” The scene also offers an explanation for why Milka often tries to get the man’s attention and talks about “always remembering him” (see the hayfield scene above): she seems to be connecting Kristus-Perkele to her late father.287 When read in the frame of abuse, it becomes clear that Kristus-Perkele is taking advantage of Milka’s vulnerability and traumatic past. Later, we are told more about his changing moods which suggest that he is himself struggling because of his actions:

On some days he was sad, melancholic. He sat on the bed for a long time, his hands on his temples, staring at the logs on the walls of the cottage. But when I comforted him, he changed and laid with me in his bed. On other days he was happy. He was signing, planing or carving wood. If I touched him then, he became unresponsive, he chased me away and cried alone in his cottage.

Toisina päivinä Kristus-Perkele oli surullinen, alakuloinen. Hän istui pitkät tovit sängyllä, kädet ohimoille painettuna, tuijottaa mökkinsä seinähir-siin. Mutta kun lohudutin häntä, hän muuttui ja makasi kanssani vuotees-saan. Toisina päivinä hän oli iloinen. Hän lauleskeli, höyläsi tai vuoli 287 It is often hinted that Milka’s father has died very tragically, but we do not learn how. The implicit narrative about her father’s death frames the whole story and explains some of Milka’s and Anna’s behavior.

---

puuta. Silloin jos kosketin häntä, hän muuttui umpimieliseksi, ajoi minut pois ja nyyhkytti yksinään mökissään. (T 48.)

We are told how, on some days, the man is sad and lets Milka comfort him—and the encounters often become sexual. On other days, he seems happy, but if Milka approaches him, he changes, chases her away and starts to cry. A lot can be read into his behavior and emotional expressions, although adult Milka does not reflect on them in any way, only describes them. There could be experiences of guilt, shame and, most importantly, knowledge that his own actions are wrong.

To sum up what we know so far: in the first chapter, Kristus-Perkele is introduced through symbols and allusions which hint at his doubled nature. The narration then moves to the hayfield scene, and when the first sexual act is narrated, the readers already have a lot of implicit, cultural, and symbolic knowledge about him, although the events are narrated from the perspective of young Milka who misinterprets the man and his actions. Later, the readers’ understanding of the man as a doubled, internally torn character is deepened through the portrayal of his changing moods and conflicted actions.

Ambiguity, Abuse, and Trauma

From today’s perspective, Kristus-Perkele’s expressions of his emotions, behavior, and actions can be read as a detailed description of the psychology of someone suffering from pedophilia. However, in the context of the 1960s Lapland in which Tabu was written, it would have been difficult to recognize the abuse: there was no vocabulary for pedophilia and such stories were often silenced—they have been cultural taboos until very recently. There is, in other words, a curious conflict in what can be seen in the text in different times and contexts, and what is clearly there to be found. As suggested earlier, recent academic readings of Tabu also largely ignore the question of abuse when discussing the relationship between Kristus-Perkele and Milka. The analyses are focused on the incest taboo and trauma in the psychoanalytical context (Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 192)288 and on the “sexual awakening” of the young girl (Lahtinen 2013, 63). An exception is Outi Oja’s (2004) short review of the republished version of Tabu. In it, she interprets the title of the novella as a reference to the taboos surrounding pedophilia. She also notes the different interpretative frames the text offers and suggests that they make it difficult for the reader to process the 288 As discussed, Mäkelä-Marttinen does mention the abuse and pedophilia, but only in passing, without elaborating on it. She first notes that Anna sees Kristus-Perkele as an abuser (Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 187) and later also suggests that the wooden ball which Milka receives from Kristus-Perkele and in which she hides the coin is a “taboo object which symbolizes the womb that has been impregnated from an incestuous and pedophilic relationship” (“Puupallo on tabuesine symboloidessaan incestisestä ja pedofiilisestä suhteesta hedelmöitynyttä kohtua”). (Ibid., 223.) story. I agree with Oja, and I have suggested here that for example the mythical frame interferes with our efforts to recognize the story as being about sexual abuse and trauma. I would also argue that the readers might even try to avoid the interpretation in which the pedophilia is acknowledged. Tabu is shocking and unsettling, because it tears open the secrets surrounding pedophilia and the sexual abuse of children.

There are many reasons in the text itself why it is easy for the readers to omit the hints of sexual abuse. As discussed, the story is narrated from the point of view of the young girl who is deeply attached to the man: she seeks his attention, she describes her own feelings as love and even dreams of marrying him. It is also possible for a reader to ignore the descriptions of Kristus-Perkele which imply his fear of being caught and rather emphasize his positive characteristics: he is depicted as a skilled and good worker who really does help Anna and Milka. Further, the shame and pain experienced by Milka in the hayfield could be interpreted as a reaction to being suddenly left behind by the man and as experiences that simply reflect the man’s expressions—not as shame involved in experiences of abuse and trauma. The sexual acts the man performs are never addressed as the cause of Milka’s suffering: rather, Milka is shown to be suffering because she feels that she has been abandoned or because she feels that she has sinned. As Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 195) notes, the sexual act itself is taboo in the social world of the novella, in the community it portrays, and this taboo affects Milka although she does not seem to be fully aware of it. As noted, there is something “innocent” in Milka: she does not know almost anything about sexuality and her desire is portrayed as something very “natural” (see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 195). The world of “adult” sexuality is completely unfamiliar to her. The experiences of shame and pain are thus ultimately detached from the man and centered on Milka. This becomes apparent especially in Milka’s prayers which (like the whole plot) may guide readers to see Milka as a “fallen woman” (see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 190).

Another source of the unsettling effect of the story is that Mukka really does try to shock his readers with the detailed descriptions of sex while at the same time maintaining a silence about its meanings. Milka’s narration consists mostly of descriptions of the environment, bodies, and action: Milka’s bodily experiences and reactions, her feelings and emotions, Milka and Kristus-Perkele in the field, the sexual act. There is no reflection or evaluation of what happens. At the beginning, the narrator describes how Milka begins to cry when Anna asks her to show what she has in her hand, but we are not told why.\(^\text{289}\) The \(^{289}\) There are many possible interpretations: Milka cries because the coin reminds her about the abuse, although she cannot name the events as abuse, or she cries because she recognizes that something “sinful” has happened, or she is distressed because she does not want to reveal to meaning of the experiences and reactions is left unverbalized. Tragically, Anna lets the matter be and does not push her daughter further. As Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 195) suggests, Anna is unable to see her own daughter’s sexuality, and this is her most tragic mistake. It appears that Anna is guided by the taboos controlling sexuality, and this prevents her from seeing what is happening around her. Everything relating to sexuality is silenced, everything is taboo (see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 195). And the most important thing that remains unsaid is that what Kristus-Perkele does is wrong (see also Oja 2004). This is left for the readers to recognize. Readers thus have a grave responsibility: to be witnesses to Milka’s narrative and to recognize it as a story about abuse and trauma.

The first chapter ends with two prayers. In the first one, adult Milka recounts what she prayed as a young girl in the evening after the hayfield. She describes how she ate and went to sleep behind Anna’s back. Again, she emphasizes that she cannot remember her exact thoughts or words, but tries to imagine them:

I took bread and milk from the cupboard and ate, I went to sleep behind mother’s back in the big bed in our other room. It was safe there. Mother held me with her warm hands, and I was not cold at all. I cannot remember, but I think that I prayed:

Dear God, a sore thorn has risen in my heart. Come my God, take it away. Do not lead me into temptation, but deliver me from evil. Protect your child so that she would not make herself guilty of sin and shame and so that she would not put despair into her mother’s bosom. Give me the light, give me the purity, for yours is the kingdom, the power and the glory, forever…

Nothing is made explicit, but the references to being safe and protected in the bed behind her mother’s back can be read in relation to what has happened earlier. There is also an allusion to the idea of being safe behind “God’s back”:

her mother what has happened. Later, in Chapter 3, Milka is playing with her late father’s cufflinks and she wonders why “silver is so expensive,” which prompts Lahtinen (2013, 73) to connect the silver coin to Judas’s betrayal of Christ. According to him, Milka “claims a silver coin for her virginity” (ibid., 72). However, once again, the symbolic interpretation directs the reading away from the abuse.
the mother is a protective figure who is supposed to take care of her child. The prayer mentions feelings of temptation, sin and shame (repeating phrases from the Lord’s Prayer), and young Milka explicitly prays that she would not cause pain to her mother. The connection between Milka and her mother is emphasized, as is the way the religious narratives of temptation, sin, and shame affect Milka.

In the second prayer, which follows right after the first one, adult Milka is praying at the time of narration, reflecting on the past:

My God. Still then was my mind innocent. Then was my soul innocent. And then was my body innocent. Now I am exhausted with sin. Now I have swum over the wide streams. Now I have wandered in the valley. Now I understand your secret. Now is the time—time has ripened me. Now I abandon you, God.

The prayer once again makes explicit Milka’s experiences which are tightly connected to religious cultural narratives: the loss of innocence, being exhausted with sin. The imagery and symbols used are borrowed especially from the Laestadian discourses. Finally, the narrator denounces her God. As mentioned earlier, it is unclear whether the prayers at the moment of narration are addressed to God or to Kristus-Perkele. When they are read in the framework of trauma and abuse, it could be argued that the narrator, adult Milka, has come to terms with the events she is describing and now abandons both her love for Kristus-Perkele and for God who allowed everything to happen. Another plausible interpretation is that she is still tied to the fiction of love for the man, and stuck in the past (see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 205; I return to this in 4.3). Her sorrow and pain would be caused by the trauma that she does not consciously acknowledge and by the loss of love—and by her knowledge of what happened in the end.

---

290 The “thorn” mentioned in the prayer can be seen as a symbol of temptation, as Lahtinen remarks, shedding light on Mukka’s use the Laestadian imagery (Lahtinen 2013, 66). It is interesting how, on the one hand, Mukka constantly relies on religious discourses in his narration, and on the other, tries to dismantle them through the story he tells.

291 Such as her mother’s insanity, or something that is not narrated in the story—e.g., the death of her son, which Mukka had planned but did not include in the story in the end. Erno Paasilinna (1988, 77) quotes one of Mukka’s notes about Tabu: “Milka’s child is mentally retarded [sic], but when he is 17 he is suddenly healed and has to go to war. The boy dies. Milka loses her mind and even burns her face” (“Milkan lapsi on vajaamielinen, mutta 17 vuotiaaksi varsittuaan yhtäkkiä paranee ja joutuu sotaan. Poika kuolee. Milka menettää järkensä, polttaa
Milka’s mind, would not be the abuse, but rather the way he deceived and abandoned Milka and Anna (see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 199).

What does it mean that Milka, as an adult woman, returns to this story of her past? Why does she, as a narrator, take up the task of recounting the past events? Usually narrating the past is used to reflect on one’s history and selfhood (as in Kaunis sielu and Tohtori Finckelman). Recollecting and recreating one’s life story creates a space for self-reflection, imagination, possible worlds and possibilities for change. In Tabu, however, there is almost no self-reflection apart from the prayers, and as we will see later, there seem to be no possibilities for future opening from the act of telling. Milka constructs a seemingly coherent narrative of her past and creates a narrative agency for herself, but it hardly offers her any relief. From the prayers, we learn that adult Milka is still suffering, but as she narrates the events, she almost never reflects on them or evaluates them, or if she does, it is still in terms of her experiences of love, temptation, and sin. The narrator seems to be telling the story of a painful love affair or about “sin,” activating the naturalist interpretation of Milka as a “fallen woman.” At the same time, the readers are invited to read the novella as a story about abuse and trauma. It becomes the readers’ task to interpret the events and to put the pieces together: in this way Tabu is similar to Kaunis sielu, although this task is not made explicit in it.

The first chapter leaves readers with a network of intersubjective relations and cultural meanings and with a story that is ambiguous and permeated by traumatic silences and blind spots. The thirteen-year-old Milka is in love with and in an abusive relationship with the “Christ-Devil.” She is spontaneously interpreting Kristus-Perkele’s bodily movements, acts, expressions, gestures, and behavior, engaging with him effortlessly but without crucial social and cultural knowledge, tragically failing to understand many of Kristus-Perkele’s actions. In contrast, readers are invited to very consciously interpret Milka and the reasons she fails in her understanding. Furthermore, readers are interpreting Kristus-Perkele’s behavior “behind” both young Milka’s and adult Milka’s backs. And finally, readers are invited to interpret narrator-Milka through her prayers which reveal her suffering.

The evocative descriptions of bodily expressions, experiences and emotions of the first chapter solicit our basic tendency to feel with others. They evoke sensory experiences and direct our attention to very basic forms of intersubjectivity: intercorporeal and interaffective relations, our attunement to other people’s bodily expressions, affective states and emotions, and how we resonate with others and effortlessly understand one another—or tragically fail in our understanding. Readers’ experiences are solicited through several techniques:

vielä kasvonsa rumiksi”). Aesthetically, the planned ending does not seem very successful and it seems fortunate that Mukka decided to leave it out.
the detailed description of bodily experiences and sensations invites bodily resonance; the traumatic events solicit emotional responses; and the misunderstandings between the characters and the fact that we know more than Milka invite empathetic responses. Readers are asked to engage with the descriptions and events on an embodied, affective level, but ultimately we are pushed to move beyond this level. There is a need to reflect on, and at the same time an inability to “make sense” of, the painful, traumatic events, which cannot be explained, only witnessed. As the story goes on, we can notice that a clear tragedy form begins to develop. This might give readers more tools to cope with the story, but at the same time it makes the novella even more ambiguous as it invites mythical frames of reading.

Ultimately, readers can take multiple possible directions for interpreting the experiences and actions of the characters of Tabu, and later also the causes for their “shattering.” First, Milka can be read as a traumatized victim of sexual abuse or as a girl who is deeply in love and abandoned by her lover. Following Mukka’s own writings about his novella, Milka has even been read as “nymphet” who seduces the adult man—an interpretation which not only completely misses the abuse but is based on a problematic reading of the novella’s intertext, Lolita. Secondly, Kristus-Perkele can be read as a sexual predator, or as a man drawn into a situation that he cannot handle (suffering from a kind of akrasia or weakness of will, as noted by Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 187) and who is deeply depressed and destructive, or as someone who falls in love with a girl who is “too young to marry” (T 21). This oscillation is tightly connected to different cultural interpretations of pedophilia (see, e.g., Sadler 2013): Kristus-Perkele’s actions can be seen as a symptom of a psychiatric disorder, a form of “evil” coming from “outside” the community, or perhaps even acceptable in a culture where the age limit for marriage is only fifteen. Yet, even in the cultural environment described in Tabu, Kristus-Perkele himself is clearly aware that his actions transgress moral norms—even though it would have been legal for him to marry Milka after she becomes pregnant at the age of fifteen. Finally, Anna can be interpreted as a mother who fails to protect her daughter from abuse, or who fails to see her daughter’s sexuality (see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 187; 195), and as a woman who is abandoned by her lover and loses her mind.

---

292 Lahtinen quotes one of Mukka’s letters dated 1966 in which he explains his ideas behind Tabu and writes that “sometimes the development into a woman begins very early, and another chapter in itself are the so-called nymphets” (“joskus naiseksi kehittyminen alkaa hyvin varhain ja luku erikseen ovat nk. nymfetit”) (Lahtinen 2013, 71). It seems that Mukka had read Nabokov’s Lolita but missed the unreliable narration of the novel and read its narrator’s explanations about “nymphets” as a fact—rather than as the narrator’s efforts to justify his own pedophilia by invoking a fictitious myth (on unreliable narration in Lolita, see, e.g., Phelan 2005). Lahtinen (ibid.) also mentions Tabu’s connection to Lolita (1955, Finn. transl. 1959) and notes that its “depiction of a sexual relationship between an older man and a young girl shocked readers also in Finland” (“kuvaus vanhemman miehen ja nuoren tytön seksuaalisesta suhteesta tyrmistytti lukijoita myös Suomessa”). However, he does not mention that both Nabokov’s Lolita and Tabu are novels about pedophilia and sexual abuse.

These readings of the characters are largely dependent on the readers’ interpretive choices, cultural background, and views and knowledge of sexual violence and abuse. Above, I have tried to show a path for reading that is invited by the text but largely missed in the previous analyses. In the following, I turn to the ways the readings of the text as a narrative of abuse and trauma and as a tragedy are intertwined.

4.2. Reading the Tragedy

The West’s images of madness always come back to tragedy and are, essentially, tragic. (Padel 1995, 248.)

The story Mukka creates leads one by one to the shattering of the characters. There is something ineffable and mysterious in the way the events unfold: a “mythical sphere of the events which are remote and detached from everyday reality,” as one of the early reviewers wrote (quoted in Paasilinna 1988, 91). This links the novella directly to classical tragedies and their modern adaptations. I discuss the themes of interpersonal madness, experiences of trauma, and the strange atmosphere in later sections, but first, let us look at how Tabu follows the classical tragedy form.

Looking at the structure of the whole novella, it is easy to see that the events follow the typical tragedy plot of hamartia, anagnoris, and peripeteia described by Aristotle in Poetics. The hero has a tragic flaw or makes a tragic mistake (hamartia), which in both Milka’s and Anna’s case is the blindness to the events around them. Further, the motif of excessive pride (hybris) becomes explicit in Anna’s story. What follows, is the recognition or critical discovery, anagnoris, which leads to the culmination of events, peripeteia, the turning point or reversal of fortune in which the fatal flaw brings the hero(es) down. Finally, there should be a catharsis, a purging of readers’ emotions through pity, fear, and shock, but in Tabu this remains ambivalent, following the naturalist and modernist traditions. Instead, an ambiguous, strange atmosphere is created.

Milka’s Tragic Mistakes

An important element of the tragedy constructed in Tabu is the way in which the characters fatally misread and misunderstand both one another and themselves. We have seen that, fatally, Milka misreads Kristus-Perkele, and is unable to recognize the relationship between him and her mother. The readers are invited to understand both these misreadings "behind" Milka’s back: the narrator adapts the position of her young self and readers have to infer what is happening without any explanation, based on the hints we can find.

293 Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 204–205) notes that there is a motif of pride also in Milka’s story: she firmly believes that her love for Kristus-Perkele is right.

In Chapter 4, the whole picture begins to become clear to the readers. A year has passed since the first events and it is again haymaking time. As the narrator recounts, she had not seen Kristus-Perkele much during the year, only twice after Pentecost when he has taken Anna and Milka to church (I discuss the Pentecost scene in the following section). Similar events and actions to those in the beginning of the novella are repeated, with the exception that we are told that Anna is now visiting Kristus-Perkele’s cottage:

Haymaking time came. Kristus-Perkele arrived again at the house, carrying his scythe and singing a song. I had not seen him more than twice after the Pentecost. But mother had visited his cottage.

All three of us went to the hayfield to work. Kristus-Perkele was mowing the field and laughing with mother. We drank sour milk together from the same dish on the edge of the trench.

Nothing is made explicit: young Milka seems to give no meaning to her mother’s visits, but for readers, they are the first hints of Anna’s relationship with him.

In the same chapter, another sexual act between Kristus-Perkele and Milka (who is now fourteen) is described. The events are framed with an account of Milka misinterpreting her own body for the first time. This time the narrator acknowledges her mistake and looks at her past self with the knowledge she has at the time of narration, but refrains from commenting the events in any other way:

This summer the first signs from which I could have inferred that I was becoming a woman had bled from me. I had sat in sauna and dried the blood on a cloth and cried, because I thought it was caused by what had happened the past summer.

– Milka, don’t you like me anymore? Kristus-Perkele asked me.

I stroked his hand and smiled.

– I do like you, but I am not the way I used to be... I am not the same...

– What are you then?

I did not reply.

Then Kristus-Perkele laughed. He squeezed my hands and stroked my bottom. He made me fall on the hay, took off my pants by force and I was no longer ashamed.
Tänä kesänä minusta olivat vuotaneet ensimmäiset merkit, joista olisin voisnut päätellä, että olin tulossa naiseksi. Olin istunut saunassa ja kuivannut veren raasuun siellä, itkenyt sen vuok si, sillä ajattelin sen johtuneen siitä mitä edellisenä kesänä oli tapahtunut.
– Milka, etkö enää pidä minusta? Kysyi Kristus-Perkele minulta.
Minä silitin hänen kättään ja hymyilin hänelle.
– Kyllä minä pidän sinustaa, mutta en ole enää niin kuin ennen... en ole enää sama...
– Mikä sinä sitten olet?
Siihen en vastannut.
Silloin Kristus-Perkele nauroi. Hän puristeli käsien ja silitti takapuoltani. Hän kaatoi minut heinälajiaan, risui housuni väkisin enää hävenyt. (T 35-36.)

Milka relies on an (unconscious) cultural narrative according to which menstruation is a punishment for a sin—for what happened the previous summer (an interpretation that is conflated with the cultural narrative of menstruation as a punishment for the biblical sin). She also enacts the understanding of menstruation as a taboo: it is something abject, ineffable, that cannot be talked about.

After Milka does not reply to Kristus-Perkele’s question, he laughs and then forces himself on Milka and they have penetrative sex for the first time. Milka accepts this and the narrator recounts that she was “no longer ashamed”: Milka is in love and what happens feels right. When they return home, more hints are given about the mother’s feelings for Kristus-Perkele:

I put my pants back on, wiped the blood off my thigh with a bunch of grass and started walking with stiff legs before him. At the well, I washed my hands and my face.

Inside the house mother was bustling around excited, more excited than I had ever seen her. She was laughing heartily at Kristus-Perkele’s every word, at his every look and offered him food, more than he could ever have eaten.

The text creates an unsettling analogy between the fourteen-year-old girl who is in love and has just had sex with an adult man and the mother who is “bustling around” and flirting with the man who has just abused her daughter.
Chapter 4: A Strange Atmosphere

The story continues with an account of Kristus-Perkele building a new room for Anna and Milka.\textsuperscript{294} When the room is finished, Kristus-Perkele spends the night there:

And often I woke up when mother sneaked into the new room to be with the man. I thought that he has to be very dear to her because she spends so much time with him and enjoys his company so much. I slept and I was happy because mother was not in a bad mood or sad. In the morning mother was bustling around, her face was shining with joy and Kristus-Perkele looked at her pleased.

At this point, it should be clear to all readers that Kristus-Perkele has a sexual relationship both with the mother and the daughter. In the same chapter yet another sexual act between Kristus-Perkele and Milka is described, and the chapter ends with a description of Milka’s continued failure to understand the relationship between Anna and the man:

That night mother stayed in the new room until morning. I saw this when I woke up: no one had slept on mother’s side of the bed.

In the morning, Kristus-Perkele and mother were laughing together. Mother called the man Ojallinen\textsuperscript{295} and Kristus-Perkele spent the whole day cutting small wood for us. I was happy about that—making the small logs had been my task the whole year.

Sinä yönä äiti oli uudessa huoneessa aamuun asti. Näin sen aamulla herä-tessäni; vuoteessa äidin puolella ei ollut nukuttu.

Kristus-Perkele ja äiti naureskelivat toisilleen aamulla. Äiti nimitti miestä Ojalliseksi ja sen päivän Kristus-Perkele hakkasi ranteella pikkupuuta meille. Minä olin iloinen siitä – olihan pikkupuiden teko koko vuoden ajan ollut minun työtäni. (T 47.)

Instead of paying attention to the fact that the mother has spent the night with Kristus-Perkele, the narrator emphasizes her relief at not having to cut wood anymore. Milka almost seems to understand what is happening but then concentrates on the wood. Just before this, we have also seen Milka talking to their cat about sex with Kristus-Perkele, saying that her mother “would say that it is \textsuperscript{294} On the chronotopes and symbolic meanings of the interior and outside spaces, especially the objects Kristus-Perkele makes for Anna and Milka, see Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 215. As she notes, many of the objects and spaces become chronotopes for the female body.

\textsuperscript{295} A tender nickname created from the man’s surname, “Ojanen.”
shameful, she would not let him do that to her.”\textsuperscript{296} We are shown how the religious narratives about sex as a sin and as a taboo contribute to Milka’s silence about the relationship to her mother, and also to both Milka’s and Anna’s failures to understand what the other person is going through. Even though Milka will not tell Anna about the relationship because of the cultural norms, she herself strongly feels that the sex is right because she loves Kristus-Perkele and believes he loves her too.

\textbf{Anna’s \textit{Hybris}}

The tragedy of \textit{Tabu} begins with Kristus-Perkele abusing Milka, Milka falling in love with the man and with her tragic mistakes, and it is then developed especially around Anna’s character. Milka misunderstands the events because she is a child, and Anna’s mistakes are also very human, such as a mother’s failure to see what her child is going through. But as the story evolves, Mukka composes Anna’s story in a very clear tragedy form. Another layer of meaning is constructed on top of the basic intersubjective engagements and failures in intersubjectivity.

Chapter 3 depicts the spring before the second haymaking season and reveals Anna’s pride over her daughter. Pentecost is approaching and Milka is trying on a yellow dress which Anna has made for her. Anna talks out loud, partly to herself, partly to Milka, as she often does, about Milka’s looks:

\begin{itemize}
  \item Walk, Milka. Yes… you are such a pretty girl. Not even a princess is more beautiful. They are so jealous of you, the other girls of the village. There is no one like you in this corner of the world, although one should not say things like this.
  \item Kävelepä, Milka. Noin… kyllä oletkin kaunis tyttö. Prinsessakaan ei vedä vertoja sinulle. Kyllä ovat kateellisia sinulle kylän toiset tytöt. Totta on, ettei näillä perukoilla sinun vertaistasi, vaikka niin ei pitäisikään puhua. (T 27.)
\end{itemize}

She reveals her pride, the idea that the other village girls are jealous, and also the notion that there is something shameful in her thoughts. Later Milka wears the dress to church, where they go together with Kristus-Perkele. He is driving a carriage borrowed from the neighboring farm, Laanila, and we are told that “everybody” is looking at them. The scene is packed with symbols and motifs of youth, spring and fertility, and it foregrounds a later scene in which Milka will be married in the same church wearing the same dress.\textsuperscript{297}

\textsuperscript{296} “Mutta hän sanoi, että se on häpeällistä, eikä hän antaisi hänen tehdä niin itselleen…” (T 46.)

\textsuperscript{297} As Lahtinen (2013, 67) notes, in pre-Christian times, Pentecost was a celebration of fertility in the spring.
Chapter 5, in turn, focuses on the events in the spring a year after that Pentecost and almost two years after the first summer. It depicts another key scene. In it, Anna rejects the marriage proposal of the old cantor of the village:

Mother went to the stairs to meet the cantor, she talked mockingly to him and did not let him inside. A blush appeared on the cantor’s face, he moved his legs, crossed his arms and looked at mother solemnly, as if from above, although mother was standing on the stairs.

The cantor has been courting Anna and it becomes clear that Anna decides to choose love instead of him. By now, readers know that she is in a relationship with Kristus-Perkele. Narrator-Milka repeats Anna’s mocking words to the cantor and shows the way Anna is reading the cantor’s thoughts in her mind, and also how he becomes embarrassed:

– […] I don’t have the feeling in my chest that would be needed in order for me to be able to marry. It is spring, but although you cantor perhaps think that “she has been without a man for such a long time—now I have a good chance, since during the spring women want men the most”—I still do not want you. And frankly, I do not think that anyone else has such feelings for you either…

Mother’s words shocked the cantor so badly that he became completely bewildered and left our yard bowing and mumbling in a dignified voice:

– Right, right…

I thought that she might laugh but she did not. She wiped the tears from her eyes, went to the new room and sat down in the rocking chair.

– What if I will be abandoned like I abandoned the cantor! She whispered. I went next to her, stroked her black hair and consoled her.

– Who would you like to have? I asked.

– You will see then, if God allows. It is entirely up to Him, mother said.

Kanttoriin äidin sanat koskivat niin, että hän typertyi kokonaan, poistui pihaltamme kumarrellen ja mutisten arvokkaalla äänellä:

– Jaha, jaaha…

Äiti pani oven kiinni, tuli sisälle.

Ajattelin, että hän nauraisi, mutta niin ei ollut. Äiti pyyhki kyyneleen silmästään, meni uuteen huoneeseen, istuutui keinutuoliin.
After this scene, Milka prays to God to help her mother, not knowing that what Anna wants is actually Kristus-Perkele. Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 196–197) has suggested that the “symbiotic” relationship—or intersubjective bond—between the girl and her mother is gradually destroyed by the man and the patriarchal power he represents. Later, in Chapter 8, after it has become clear that Kristus-Perkele has left and Anna does not yet know why, Anna makes explicit the connection between her abandoning the cantor and Kristus-Perkele disappearing (a very clear moment of peripeteia): “This is how I am punished for talking to the cantor so arrogantly.”

The Recognition

How is the situation then revealed to everybody? Chapter 6 recounts the events that happen later in the spring. Milka is about to turn fifteen and Anna is getting over having rejected cantor Malmström. She is spending more time with Kristus-Perkele. There are several hints before Milka recognizes what is happening: “mother’s face was happy,” she is “smiling coyly,” “blushing.” A partial recognition happens after the man has finished building the new room for Anna and Milka and stays for the night in their home:

That night mother slept with Kristus-Perkeleen in the new room. I tried to listen to their talk, but they did not say much. I could not sleep either. I laid in the big bed in the alcove, rolling and turning around. From this day on I would be fifteen years old—that is what I was thinking. In the small hours I saw mother through the chink of the curtains as she went out. She was naked, she had only a scarf around her waist: she tiptoed over the garden and came back. The night was light and I could see her face, smiling. Perhaps then I suspected something.

But I only suspected, I did not understand enough to think about it then, and when I finally fell asleep, I slept soundly until midday.

298 “Näin minua siitä rangaistaan, että lukkaria ylimielisesti puhuttelin, huokasi äiti.” (T 64.)
299 “Äidin kasvot olivat iloiset.” (T 54.); “Nään, miten äiti hymyili kainosti hänelle, kuin hän olisi ollut pikkutyttö, joka punastuen muistaa hänelle uskotin asian [...]” (T 55.)
Next day her mother wakes her up: she is full of joy and starts to talk. The question of understanding another and knowing the others’ experiences is thematized in Anna’s speech:

– Milka, my child… I wish you knew, I wish you knew what a good day this is… How wonderful I feel!

Mother hummed as she performed her chores, she did her work like a sleepwalker.

– … perhaps soon, Milka dear, you will get a father, she said.

I put the cup of porridge down, washed it, I thought about those words. My God, how I tried to think! From her words, I suspected…

– Do you mean him, mother?

– Him. Who else would be as good…

– Milka pikkunen… tietäisitpä, tietäisitpä, miten hyvä päivä tämä on…

Miten hyvä minun on olla!

Äiti kulki hyräillen askareillaan, toimitti töitään kuin unissakulkija.

– … ehkäpä piankin, Milka pieni, saat isän itsellesi, hän puheli.

– Hämätö tarkoitat, äiti?

– Hämätä. Kukapa muu niin hyvä olisi… (T 56.)

At this point, Milka finally understands what is happening. Narrator-Milka recounts that “I waited for the evening to come as if I were ill […].” 300 In the evening, Milka rushes to meet Kristus-Perkele and several new misunderstandings occur: “– What has happened? I saw from his eyes that he feared that something had happened to mother.” 301 Milka once again interprets Kristus-Perkele’s thoughts, but we have no way of knowing whether she is right or not. A more plausible explanation would perhaps be that he is afraid that Anna has finally found out about his sexual relationship with her daughter. Milka then confronts Kristus-Perkele:

– Why are you abandoning me now?

– I am not abandoning you, Milka my friend. I am yours. I do not think about anyone else than you.

– But still you will take my mother as your wife. Take me!

– Miksi sinä minut nyt hylkääät?

---

300 “Odotin iltaa kuin sairastuneena […]” (T 56).
301 “– Mitä on tapahtunut, Milka pieni? Kysyi hän uudestaan. Hänen silmistään näin, että hänen oli hätä siitä mitä äidille oli tapahtunut.” (T 56–57.)
Milka takes off her clothes and talks to the man, calling him once again “Kristus” (Christ):

I whispered:
– Christ… come, come…
He turned around and looked at me lying there. I wanted to have him as my own, this is why I closed my eyes and let him look at my body. But he came to me, took my head in his arms and looked me in the eyes with an agitated and timid look and asked me:
– Milka, tell me… Is there still blood coming from you?
– Not any more, I replied smiling. – Aren’t you happy about that?

Kuiskasin:
– Kristus… tule, tule…
Hän kääntyi ja katsoi minua, kun makasin siinä. Halusin saada hänet omakseni, siksi suljin silmäni ja annoin hänen katsoa ruumistani. Mutta kun hän tuli luokseni, hän otti päätä käsissä ja katsoi silmieni vaahkon ja säikkyneen oloisena ja kysyi:
– Milka, sano minulle… vieläkö veri tulee sinusta?
– Ei enää, minä vastasin hänelle hymyillen. – Etkö ole siitä iloinen? (T 57.)

The readers and Kristus-Perkele find out almost simultaneously that Milka is pregnant. Or more precisely, the readers learn through the description of Kristus-Perkele’s behavior and shock, and the pregnancy is confirmed when he asks Milka about her period. This is Milka’s final misinterpretation: she believes that her “sins” have been forgiven since her period has stopped. There is a chain of recognitions: first Milka finds out about the relationship between Anna and Kristus-Perkele, then Kristus-Perkele and readers realize that Milka is pregnant.

The chapter ends by Kristus-Perkele giving a wooden ball to Milka as a present for her fifteenth birthday. As instructed by Kristus-Perkele, she seals the coin (which he had given her in the hayfield almost two years earlier) inside the ball. Kristus-Perkele says goodbye and at this point readers are likely to understand that he will escape from the village. The chapter ends with Anna looking at the ball:

– The things he comes up with, mother said admiring the ball. – What is inside it?
– I do not know, I said. – It is impossible to open the ball…
– Perhaps he will tell me, said mother.

– Kaikkea hän keksiikin, sanoi äiti palloa ihaillen. – Mitä sen sisällä on?
– En tiedä, sanoi minä. – Palloa ei saa avatuksia…
– Ehkä hän sen minulle sanookin, sanoi äiti. (T 58.)
All the elements of the tragedy are now in place. The readers, like Kristus-Perkele, now know everything but Milka and Anna are still partly in the dark, and we are left to wait for their final recognitions. We expect the shock to come. At the same time, the meaning of the ball remains ambiguous. It becomes a symbol of the secret at the heart of the novella, but no one seems to know what the secret exactly is. We are all invited to give our own interpretations of the object, to reflect on it like Anna does. The ball gets different meanings depending on the perspective from which it is looked at: the three main characters, the early readers and critics of the novella, different academic readers, and today’s readers. Depending on the perspective, the secret and taboo is the pregnancy, the sexuality, the incest, or the sexual abuse and trauma.

When Kristus-Perkele does not return, Anna becomes worried and sick. At this point, narrator-Milka focuses on how Anna waits for him and becomes increasingly desperate: “He did not come back. Mother sat by the window day after day, stared outside and waited, knitted a sweater for the man, sighing. Neither of us went to the village and the villagers did not come to us.” Finally, Milka and Anna visit Kristus-Perkele’s cottage and confirm that it is abandoned: the windows are broken and it is empty. Milka recounts how Anna’s state becomes even worse, she isolates herself, cries in her bed, and cannot work:

At home mother went to bed, she lay there for several days, crying, sometimes falling asleep. I milked the cows, wiped the floors, cooked for myself. Mother did not eat anything during those days. Then, after having lain down for a week, she got up, walked slowly creeping, staring at someone with a serious face. I did not see a smile on mother’s face anymore, she did not go to the village, not even to Laanila.

Anna’s interpretation is that she is being punished for abandoning the cantor— for her hybris. Milka also describes a change in her mother’s appearance:

Mother wiped her hair with shaking hands. She had lost weight, there were dark veins under her eyes, deep under the surface of the skin, her cheeks had lost their roundness, only her lips had kept their color: they were even bloodier than before, like pieces of raw bloody meat. From the pale face they were visible like a dark mark. But there was no smile on mother’s lips.

---

302 “Hän ei palannut. Äiti istui ikkunassa päivänä, ulos tuijottaan ja odottaan, neuloen miehen paitaa, huoaten. Emme käyneet kylässä kumpikaan, eivätkä kyläläiset käyneet meillä.” (T 62.)
With a quiet voice she talked as if to herself, almost not seeing me. I sat quietly. I listened to her.

Whereas Anna’s monologues were earlier addressed both to herself and to Milka, now Milka feels that Anna talks only to herself, barely noticing her. Her mother’s sorrow has an effect on Milka, which narrator-Milka tells empathically, adopting her young self’s voice in a narrated monologue: “I felt as if also my heart had been filled by her pain. Oh, oh, how full of pain.” Occasionally, Anna seeks comfort from Milka, talking to her out loud:

But we do have each other, Milka, maybe it is the way it should be. Perhaps only the body desires, even now as I am waiting for him here alone. Perhaps the body is weak, but then God gives us strength so that the soul would be strong and fight against the body...

Onhan meillä toisemme, Milka, ehkä sen täytyykin olla nääin. Ehkä vain ruumis himoitsee, nytkin kun ilman häntä odotan tässä. Ehkä ruumis on heikko, mutta Jumala antaa silloin voimia, jotta sielu olisi luja ja taistelisi ruumista vastaan… (T 66.)

The cultural narrative according to which everything related to the body, sex, and sexuality is forbidden is repeated in Anna’s speech: she seems to come to a conclusion that her love and passion for the man has been a sin—her sinful body desiring.

Finally, when Anna and Milka go to the sauna, Anna recognizes that her daughter is pregnant. The readers find this out through a reported monologue, as Anna is again saying her thoughts out loud:

– Milka, how come your stomach is so... so, now that you bend down? Mother asked.
She came to me, tested my stomach with her hands, a horrified expression spread on her face.
– Oh my God, Milka... Milka..., mother whispered.
– With whom have you been? I can see...
She climbed up to the benches with tears in her eyes. I stood on the floor.
– ....she has not been with anyone, no. Except maybe he... or maybe, maybe Laanila’s son has been with you, Milka... she said staring at me.
– You are a child. What about Ojanen? How could it be that you, Milka... you will have a child!

303 “Minun tuntui kuin sydämeni olisi tullut täyteen hänen tuskastaan. Oh, oh, miten täyteen.” (T 65.)
Chapter 4: A Strange Atmosphere

First, Anna speaks to Milka but then stops and addresses the words to herself, realizing that Kristus-Perkele must be the father. Finally, she confronts Milka, practically asking her to deny what she knows to be true:

– Milka, say you have not lain with anyone, haven’t you…? Say it, Milka… You went to Ojanen often, what did you do there? Tell me, tell me! My God, tell me that you did not do anything! Mother shouted with a horrified, crying voice.

– Milka, ethän ole hänen kanssaan pannut vuoteeseen makailemaan, ethän…? Sano, Milka… sinä kävit Ojasen luona usein, mitä teitte siellä? Sano, sano! Hyvä Jumala, sano etette tehneet mitään! Huusi äiti kauhussalla itkevällä äänellä. (T 70.)

Milka then denies that she has been with anyone, and the narrator describes how she gradually understood that she will have a child and how she stayed adamant: she had not been with anyone. The scene is puzzling. It is impossible to know exactly why Milka lies. Because of shame or fear? To reply as her mother wishes and to protect her? Because she loves Kristus-Perkele and needs to protect him? Because there are no words for what has happened, and the secret is sealed inside the ball?

The reality of the storyworld is torn in two when Milka lies to her mother (and later also to the cantor) and her mother accepts the lie although, on some level, she must to know the truth. Two opposing states become true at the same time: Milka has slept with Kristus-Perkele and will have his child and Milka is a virgin and will have God’s child. The readers know the latter to be untrue, but the discrepancy is kept up in the storyworld: Milka will not admit the truth to anyone, no matter what happens. Kristus-Perkele has disappeared and Anna and other characters accept Milka’s denial. A false shared world in which Kristus-Perkele is not the father is developed. The meaning of the fact that Kristus-Perkele is the father of Milka’s child is never made explicit in the story: Milka is a victim of abuse and Anna has failed to protect her daughter.

This continuing ambiguity is reflected in adult Milka’s prayers: as discussed, readers never find out without a doubt what the prayers mean and to whom they are addressed. They are a confession of sin—but also an “inversed prayer,” an abandonment of God and faith (see Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 189). On one level, they are addressed to God, but in Milka’s (and later Anna’s) mind, Kristus-Perkele has become God.304 At the time of narration, adult Milka prays: “I do not want to see your eyes anymore, I do not want to kiss your lips anymore, I will not lie beside you anymore, I will not open my thighs for you. You do not exist anymore, God…”305 The religious and the sexual experiences are intermingling, and this is aligned with the symbolism of the Laestadian discourses in which sexuality and the sacred are often combined. On the level of the events, young Milka connects her pregnancy to God:
Fictions of Madness

Dear God, I am carrying your child under my heart, you have hidden your seed inside me. […] God, do not forget your most beloved. Be like a father to me, be the safety for your child, be with me God…

There are symbols and references to religious discourses: the unborn child is the hidden seed of God, the sexual and familial love for a father are merging. At this point, Milka is expressing both Anna’s and her own thoughts and experiences:

So we both cried in the new room, sitting by the bed made by Kristus-Perkele, mother and I. And although neither of us said it out loud, we both knew: we cried because of him, nothing else. When he had left, he had left us a thought, a memory of himself that was very painful.

As Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 188) remarks, everything around Milka and Anna is made by Kristus-Perkele. The man has not only left a thought or a memory of himself, but he has also created the material world which scaffolds Milka’s and Anna’s experiences—the room, the bed, the chair—and of course he has also left a child. Chapter 10 begins with Milka accepting that Kristus-Perkele is gone, and we are told how she sees that her mother also understands—she is perceiving the experience in Anna’s eyes:

304 This is a point also Mäkelä-Marttinen and Lahtinen make, and Lahtinen notes the way Milka explicitly calls Kristus-Perkele “Christ” (see Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 199; Lahtinen 2013, 65).
305 “En tahdo enää nähdä silmüäsi, en enää tahdo suudella huuliasi, en vierellesi enää asetu makaamaan, en enää sinulle avaa reisiäni. Ei sinua enää ole, Jumala…” (T 73.)
Kristus-Perkele did not come back. Even the last kindling of hope that he would return disappeared and we stopped waiting for him. Not even mother waited—it is easy to see things like that even if they were hidden. The eyes of a person who waits reveal their thoughts to others—the look that expresses that a soul is waiting for its loved one did not live in mother’s eyes. It had already disappeared from her.

Kristus-Perkele ei palannut. Viimeinenkin toiveen kipinä siitä, että hän tulisi takaisin, sammui, emmekä enää hänä odottaneetkaan. Tuskin äitikään enää, sillä sellaiset asiat olivat helppo huomata, vaikka ne salattaisiinkin. Odottajan silmät paljastavat ajatuksensa muille – äitini silmissä ei enää ollut sitä näköä, joka ilmaisee että sielu vartoo rakastaan. Se oli jo äidistä kadonnut. (T 76.)

The “first act” of the tragedy then ends with Anna going insane. In the following, I look at the “second” act: how the madness spreads in the community. The overall tragedy form of the novella is constructed through the repetition of classical motifs: tragic mistakes, blindness and misunderstandings; characters’ lack of crucial knowledge, their pride or hybris; finally the recognitions and turning point. When Kristus-Perkele disappears, Milka’s and Anna’s worlds are shattered.

4.3. Trauma and Interpersonal Madness

Greek tragedy represents madness as something temporary, come from outside... It is inner writhing, expressed externally in dancelike jerkiness. People know you are mad by how you look and move. (Padel 1995, 238.)

As Padel writes, the madness of tragic characters becomes visible in the way they look and move: in their bodies, gestures, and actions. Milka describes how Anna is sitting in the new room, half awake, talking to herself, avoiding her daughter. Even her voice has changed: “But her voice was as if strange now, as if it belonged to someone else, but no longer to mother.” 306 Milka describes again both their feelings and the way she read her mother’s thoughts from her gaze:

Sorrow and anxiety lived under both of our chests. I guessed that my mother was thinking about the child inside me, because most often her gaze was directed at my stomach where the bump was. I could not look her in the eyes. If I tried, she turned away her head.

Murhe ja ahdistus asui meidän kummankin rinnan alla. Arvasin äitini ajattelevan lasta, joka oli sisälläni, sillä mieluummin hänen katseensa sattui ylös, kun se olisi ollut jokin toisen, mutta ei äidin ääni.” (T 77.)

---

306 “Mutta hänen äänensä oli nyt ikään kuin vieraas, kuin se olisi ollut jonkun toisen, mutta ei äidin ääni.” (T 77.)
vatsani sille kohdalle, jossa kohouma oli. Silmiin en saanut häntä katsoa, jos yritin, hän käänisi päätä pois. (T 78.)

The most emblematic scene of madness in the novella is the one in which Milka sees her mother at the well: “Through the window I saw mother combing her hair at the well. She was so insane.”307 There is a window, a glass pane separating mother and daughter; Anna’s loose hair and the open well function as symbols of madness. As Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 213) remarks, the way Anna is combing her hair can be read as a ritual for trying to clean herself from the dirt of the taboo, and the well symbolizes a path to the otherworldly. Hair is also an object of liminality and abjection, like menstruation, and we can recall that also Milka was originally introduced to us through her hair that was “dripping water.”308 As the story is coming to its end, we are shown how the “madness” is shared: Milka ends up narrating the others’ shattering as well as her own. In the final chapters, the narration moves between Milka’s description of her own experiences and her account of her mother and the neighbors’ young son, Auno, both losing their minds.

The final events begin to unfold after both Anna and Milka have learned that Milka is pregnant. Since Kristus-Perkele is gone, Auno from the neighboring farm, Laanila, comes to help them with the hay. His help is a gesture of neighborly kindness, but we also know that he is in love with Milka and has been trying to get her attention since the beginning of the story. In the background of the story about Milka, Anna and Kristus-Perkele is an implicit narrative according to which Milka and Auno are supposed to get married when they grow up. When the hay is brought into the barn, Milka allows Auno to touch her as a “reward” for his work in the field.309 In this moment, Auno, too, realizes that Milka is expecting a child. Milka’s pregnancy comes as a shock also to Auno:

– Milka, how come you are? I felt it... you are expecting a child... to whom? To whom are you expecting? To Kristus-Perkele, I can guess... Milka, Milka, what do you say...? Words came out of his mouth irrationally, agitated, so fast that I cannot remember precisely everything that he said.

– Milka, miten olet? Minä tunsin sen... sinä odotat lasta... kenelle? Kenelle odotat? Kristus-Perkeleelle, minä arvaan... Milka, Milka, mitä sanot...? Hän puhui sanoja järjettömästi suustaan päästellen, kiihtyneenä, niin nopeasti, etten saatat muistaa kaikkea mitä hän sanoi. (T 83.)

307 “Ikkunasta näin, että äiti kampasi tukkaansa kaivolla, niin mieletön hän oli.” (T 102.)
308 On the symbols of liminality and Milka as a liminal character between childhood and adult life, spiritual and bodily, sacred and sinful, see Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 206; Lahtinen 2013, 69.
309 See also Lahtinen 2013, 72. As usual, Auno’s and Milka’s actions are not problematized in any way in the story.
Chapter 4: A Strange Atmosphere

Auno is the only character who seems to understand without a doubt that the father of the child is Kristus-Perkele. The readers are likely to be on Auno’s “side”: he is correct in his recognition and we may sympathize with him because of his love for Milka—although he, too, repeats some very disturbing models of masculinity.

The beginning of the story is now repeated for the third time: it is the third haymaking, Milka and (this time) Auno have been lying in the hay and there has been a sexual encounter. After Auno’s recognition, Milka runs out from the barn. Once again, it suddenly begins to rain heavily and narrator-Milka describes her feelings of distress and the way she was wandering aimlessly in the rain and crying:

My mind was as if sick and helpless and cries were strangling my throat. Perhaps, I thought then, perhaps I like Auno a little. The rain was bursting on the ground around me, the surface of the road was filled with puddles. I walked over a kilometer barefoot, soaking wet, my teeth chattering. My hair was tangled: hay was sticking from it. The house of Hieta where cantor Malmström lived was by the road, on an island created by a small stream: by the house, the stream forked in two and it was connected again by the forest. That is where I went.

For reasons that are not explained in any way, Milka goes to the cantor’s house, soaking wet. She tells him that she wants to marry him, takes off her clothes and invites the cantor to have sex with her. The cantor, too, recognizes that Milka is pregnant: he refuses and suggests that Milka has been “playing with some boy,” but Milka denies that she has been with anyone, even swears it. Ultimately the cantor, like Anna earlier, seems to believe her, and later he even refers to the story of the Immaculate Conception as an explanation for Milka’s pregnancy. For reasons that are not in any way explained (but can easily be inferred), the cantor accepts Milka’s refusal to talk about the pregnancy and agrees that if Milka would still want to marry him the next day, he would accept her. We can read a lot into his decision: a mixture of sexual desire, kindness, even revenge for his hurt pride, and also a religious belief that he could be facing a miracle. As the man puts his hand on Milka’s thigh, she describes a sense of losing the ownership of her own body:

310 “Sinä leikit jonkun pojan kanssa […]” (T 85.)
311 “We do know one incident from the Word... God moves in a mysterious way...” (“Tunnemmehan toki Sanastakin tapauksen... ihmeellisiä ovat herran tiet...” T 93.)

He forgot his hand on my thigh. I did not take it away, how could I have. It did not matter whether he kept his hand on my waist or in his pocket. This I did not think then. My mind was like the rain: hasty, fearful but fierce. The water hit the window of the chamber, becoming stronger and relenting again.

She compares her state of mind to the rain: it is as if some kind of force of nature guided her actions. In a symbolic reading, the mythical base structure seems to govern her actions, and the strange atmosphere is developing. I return to Milka’s decision in the final section, but let us first look at the final events of the novella.

When Milka returns home, she reveals her decision to her mother. Anna accepts the news without emotion or surprise, focusing more on herself: “…it is understandable, my child, it is. I suppose he will take you, you are a big girl already, Milka. You know what to do and what not to do. I have been crushed by sorrow already… You understand, don’t you?” 312 Her talk reflects what trauma theorists have called the “sense of a foreshortened future”: there seems to be no future left for her (see Ratcliffe 2017, 117). Whereas the words evoke a feeling of resignation, her bodily actions show affective experiences that are not explained: she takes Milka on her lap, stroking her hair and they rock in the chair until Anna falls asleep. The roles of mother and daughter are gradually being reversed (see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 201).

The following chapter (Chapter 12) begins from the next morning. Milka sleeps late but Anna receives Laanila’s wife who has come to talk about Auno and Milka. When the wife has left, Anna tells Milka that (also) Auno wants to marry her:

Mother’s words made me so sad that I began to cry. I cried in horror because of myself, because it felt like my own being had become foreign and inexplicable to me, as if I knew nothing about myself, not a moment about my life forward.

[…] – I know, I know, I cried. – I knew it… but still I will marry the cantor.

Äidin sanoista mieleni pahoittui niin, että puhkesin itkuun. Nyyhkytin kauhuissani itseni takia, sillä minusta tuntui kuin oma olentoni olisi käynyt

312 “…se on ymmärrettävää, tyttäreni, hyvinkin. Kaiketi hän sinut ottaa, olet iso tyttö jo, Milka. Kyllähän sinä jo tiedät mitä teet, mitä jättät tekemättä. Minut on suru jo musertanut al-leen… ymmärräähän?” (T 88.)
Milka describes a feeling of hopelessness, loss of future and loss of self. Again, the experiences can be read in the framework of trauma. However, they also evoke an impression of lack of psychological depth: Milka is acting like a character in a tragedy, an actant in some unknown plot without any real agency of her own.

As mentioned earlier, Ratcliffe has emphasized the loss of trust in others and in the world resulting from traumatic experiences that are inflicted by other people. As he puts it, “‘losing trust’ involves losing a habitual confidence that more usually permeates all experience, thought, and activity” (Ratcliffe 2017, 120). Our experiences are to a large extent interpersonally regulated and supported: we are often dependent on others to know and to remember things, we trust others to help us and guide us in the world, and sometimes even our perceptions are dependent on others who can verify or deny whether what we are seeing or experiencing is true or not. In trauma, much of this interpersonal world is altered. As Ratcliffe writes: “If others in general are not to be trusted, then practices that depend on their behaving in certain ways are not to be trusted either.” (Ratcliffe 2017, 147.) After Kristus-Perkele is gone, Milka’s and Anna’s whole world is changed. Both Milka and Anna are faced with a destructive violation of trust by Kristus-Perkele. Nothing has been the way they thought, and their worlds are shattered. This also involves a shattering of their intersubjective bond: there is no more “us.”

In the end, not only Anna and Milka are portrayed as losing their minds, but also Auno. After Milka’s decision, we are told about a change in him. Milka notices how, like Anna’s, his body is changing: “I saw that he had become thin, his cheeks were as if hollow. Was he sad because of me? I thought, but I did not want to think about it further. Why would I care about Auno?” As a first-person narrator, Milka has no access to Auno’s thoughts but she sees how he has lost weight and he is becoming different. Concern and responsibility arise in her mind, but she interrupts them immediately and the narrator does not elaborate on Milka’s decision to reject Auno any further.

After the decision to marry the cantor, Milka describes how she lived as if in a dream. She is now fifteen and old enough to get married, but still has to be confirmed first. The time at confirmation school is described in short flashes:

313 “Näin, että hän oli lähitunut, hänen poskensa olivat ikään kuin painuneet kuopille. Oliko hän suruissaan minun takia? Ajattelin, mutta en tahtonut miettiä sitä enempää. Mitä Auno minulle kuului?” (T 96.)
“The whole period was almost like a dream. I read diligently the whole week, even at night.”314 The motif of memory loss is then repeated again: Milka does not remember the wedding, or more precisely the only thing that she remembers is her mother's distress:

We were wed on the second week of November, but my memory has lost the event, I cannot remember it any more. I only remember that mother sat in the church on the first bench, laughing and crying in turns—that day she lost her mind for good, and her speech and behavior were never again like others'. The few people who were at the church that Sunday stared at my mother more than me and the cantor. When we drove home in Laanila's carriage, mother laughed the whole way. A light drizzle was falling from the sky, so that we all were wet before arriving at home. I wore my yellow dress: I had myself made it longer. The cantor was blowing his nose and mother was stroking his shoulders.

There is an explicit description of the mother “losing her mind” permanently on the wedding day. Milka makes what could be described as “folk psychiatric” interpretations about her mother’s state of mind: Anna laughs and cries, she does not behave like other people. The description is also steeped with symbolic meaning: the event creates an allusion to the previous church trip during Pentecost a year and a half ago. Milka wears the same yellow dress which she wore that spring.315 The cantor has taken the place of Kristus-Perkele in the scene and the mother is caressing the old cantor’s shoulder. It is as if the two visits to church, for Pentecost and the wedding, were somehow infused and time stood still or was looping. We are also told that on the wedding night, Anna sits in the new room and stares at Milka and the cantor in their bed, made by Kristus-Perkele. At night, Milka feels disgust at the old man’s body and in the morning, she sees how Anna is combing her hair at the well: “she was so insane.”316

---

314 “Ikään kuin unta oli jollain tavoin se aika. Luin alkerasti koko viikon, yölläkin.” (T 100.)
315 Lahtinen suggests that the yellow dress can be interpreted as a symbol of the “fertility of the earth” but also of “flowers that have turned yellow because of rain”: Milka is a “tarnished” bride (Lahtinen 2013, 67).
316 “niin mieletön hän oli.” (T 102.)
The descriptions of nature continue to mirror the characters’ emotions and mental states. Milka depicts how even the nature has become ill:

The air outside had cooled. Bleak wind was blowing from the Hillock: the scarce yellow leaves, the last ones attached to the birch branches, were torn rejoicingly with the wind, they flew to the ground dancing fiercely, trembled a little, then settled in their place. The ground was full of yellow, even black decomposed leaves. The pine forest behind the strips had also turned yellowish—a disease had killed the pine needles and made them yellow this year—and wind was blowing in the twigs.

A page later, the narrator describes how a piece of paper was flying uncontrollably in the wind:

In the yard the short hay was bending. The wind was brushing the tops of the hay, a big brown piece of paper was raising up like heavy breath in the wind, pressing itself to the ground, hesitating, wavering, finally throwing itself to the wind. It flew over the yard, was hit at the fence post and stuck on it.

The description of nature, the disease in the forest and the paper flying and crushing on the pole evoke a sense of loss of control. As Lahtinen (2013, 66–67) notes, the story follows the changing seasons: it is now autumn and the end of growth and development. The “cosmic” powers implied in the description of nature are also one element in the creation of the strange atmosphere of the novella.

At the beginning of Chapter 14, Milka is a married girl: she is now Milka Malmström instead of Milka Sierkkiniemi. From Auno, Milka learns that Kristus-Perkele has been caught for stealing Laanila’s horse and imprisoned. The news shocks her, but she seems to be unable to reflect on it further:

For a moment it was fun that the white snow covered the ground, but soon that joy was over. Not because of the cantor or mother; otherwise, inexplicably my mind was as if sick and crippled and I all the time thought: what are they doing to him now... I wish someone would come who could tell...
Hetkeksi riitti hauska siitä, että valkoinen lumi kattoi maan, mutta ilo oli kohta ohi. Ei kanttorin, eikä äidinkään takia; muuten, selittämättömästi oli mieleni kuin sairas ja rampa ja yhtenään ajattelin: mitä he nyt tekevät hänelle... tulisipa joku, joka tietäisi kertoa... (T 105.)

Milka feels sick, but she cannot really understand the reason for her feelings: they are “inexplicable,” her mind feels “sick” and “crippled.” From her shock at the news, it nonetheless becomes clear that she is sad for Kristus-Perkele, worrying about him and his fate, and she is still in love with him. At the same time, her connection with her mother is gone, and Anna is strange and horrifying—Milka is even afraid of her. Anna’s eyes in which Milka earlier saw her experiences appear now as empty: “I was horrified each time I looked into mother’s eyes. She was laughing but her eyes did not have any expression, she was sometimes caressing the cantor, stroking the back of his neck. But nothing she did or said was natural.”317 Anna is also walking around the house, looking at the objects made by Kristus-Perkele:

– ...he did this here, planed... fixed. How skilled he was! Even this here! Here, here has a man been working, so good it has become. Everything so fine. How he knew... I know that... There are not many people like that, it is rare that a skillful infant is born...

– ...hän teki tämän tässä, höyläsi... laittoi. Miten taitava hän olikaan! Tämäkin tässä! Siinä, siinä on mies puuhaillut, hyvä siitä on tullut. Hyviä kaikki. Kylläpä hän osasi... tiedänhan minä sen... Ei ole monia sellaisia, harvoin satuu syntymään saapakätinen ihmislapsi... (T 106.)

Like Milka in her prayers, also Anna is now clearly connecting Kristus-Perkele to God. She chatters to herself, wondering about the wooden ball in a way that reveals the associations she makes:

She took the wooden ball from the table, rolled it around in her hand, stared ahead with eyes that saw nothing.

– ... what is inside... here? It rattles sweetly. He knows it. He has hidden a secret inside. Someone shall try to find out. Wonderful is his providence. No one can guess what is inside here, should one even. A punishment is given for it... for curiosity. Wonderful are his works... unknown are the ways of the Lord...

Hän otti puupallon poydaltä, pyörittä sitä kädessään mitäänäkkemättömän silmin eteensä tuijottaaen.

– ... mitäähän on sisällä... tällä? Tämä helähtää somasti. Hän sen tietää. Hän on sinne salaisuuden piilottanut. Yrittäköön joku ottaa siitä selvän. Ihmeellinen on hänen johdatuksensa. Kukaan ei aavista, mitä tällä on,

317 “Kauhistuin joka kerta äidin silmiä katsoessani. Hän nauroi ilmeettömän silmin, hyväili toisinaan kanttoria, silitteli hänen niskaansa. Mutta mikään, minkä hän teki tai sanoi, ei ollut luonnollista.” (T 105.)
Milka has completely lost her connection to her mother. Instead, Anna speaks her fragmented thoughts aloud and the narrator merely records them. Auno is also depicted in an even more severe state than earlier:

Auno was sitting in the dark in the corner of the room. He did not speak, not a word, just sat there dark and grave, I almost was afraid of him. He had become even paler; his cheeks were even hollower than before. It was as if he was plagued by a severe disease. Even his eyes had fallen in their sockets, become big and immobile. [...] He did not say anything to me, although I sat on the bench right next to him and quietly in my mind wished that he would have something to say to me.

Milka tries to find a connection to Auno, also but this proves impossible. Everyone close to her is shattered.

In the final chapter (Chapter 15), Christmas is approaching, and the child is born in the first week of December. Auno’s mother comes to help with the birth and the child is healthy, but after giving birth, Milka gets a high fever. During her illness, she hallucinates Kristus-Perkele and feels how her whole body is craving for him. The child is taken to the shopkeeper to be fed while Milka is ill, and when Milka recovers and the baby is brought back, she notices that Anna seems to be afraid of the infant. Milka even fears that Anna might hurt him, but she doesn’t, she just stares at him and talks to “Christ,” asking for “mercy.” Milka’s final prayer is ambivalent:

My God, my most beloved. Many nights I have waited for you, I have slept with my lap open, I would have spread my legs for you. Why have you abandoned me, why have you forsaken your child. At night I tremble with coldness, at day my eyes peer out to the village—you will not answer my call.

Jumala, minun rakkaimpani. Monina öinä olen odottanut sinua, olen nukkunut sylini levittäneenä, jalkani olisin avannut sinulle. Miksi sinä olet minut hylännyt, miksi olet lapsesi unohtanut. Öisin värisen vilusta, päivisin silmäni kylälle tähyävät – sinä et vastaa kutsuuni. (T 116.)
Fictions of Madness

The last prayer, and the last lines of the novella, seems to combine several different perspectives. Most strongly it seems to belong to young Milka after the birth of her son. It repeats the way both Milka and Anna were waiting for Kristus-Perkele to return when he first disappeared. Before the birth of the child, both had given up hope, but now Milka is waiting again. The narrator, who abandoned “God” at the very beginning of the story, has for some reason become silent. At the moment of narration, Milka has to be about the same age as Anna was when the events happened, and one could argue that in the prayer Anna and Milka.318

As Ratcliffe suggests, the sense of foreshortened future involved in trauma can be characterized with what Mark Freeman has called a “narrative foreclosure;” “the premature conviction that one’s life story has effectively ended; there is no more to tell; there is no more that can be told.” (Freeman 2000, 89; see also Ratcliffe 2017, 117.) The novella ends with the enigmatic prayer and we are told nothing about later events—it is as if they had never happened. Apart from the prayers in which adult Milka abandons God, she appears to be stuck in the past. This has also been noted by Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 205) who writes that Milka is “imprisoned” in her memories.319 From an aesthetic and affective perspective, Mukka’s decision not to elaborate on adult Milka’s life or the situation in which she is telling her story is extremely effective: it adds to the sense of uncertainty, loss of trust in the world, and loss of future.

Also a mythical reading is still possible. As Padel (1995, 238) notes, “Greek tragedy represents madness as something temporary, come from outside.” It is the revenge of the gods. The madness from outside in Tabu is Kristus-Perkele, an outsider who breaks the intersubjective, social world and is an internally torn character. The events triggered by his arrival drive Anna, Auno, and ultimately Milka insane. Symbolically they end up paying the price for Kristus-Perkele’s transgressions and crimes (see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 192). Their intersubjective world is destroyed, and it is not reestablished in the end, although Kristus-Perkele disappears and Milka’s son is born healthy. However, there is some hope, albeit very precarious. The villagers come to help when

---

318 As Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 202) observes through her Dostoyevskian reading, Milka and Anna become doubles.

319 She also links Milka to the tradition of abject heroes and suggests, referring to Dostoyevsky’s Underground Man, that she is “stuck in the cellar of her loneliness and obsessive-compulsive neurosis” (“yksinäisyytensä ja pakkoneuroosinsa kellariloukkoon jäänyt”) (Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 205). However, in my view the character of Milka is a very different from the Underground Man (or, e.g., the abject hero narrators of Kaunis sielu or Tohtori Finckelman): she does not go through experiences of self-hate, self-disgust or self-pity (see Bernstein 1992, 89–90), and she is not hyperreflexive like the Underground Man (see Sass 1994, 4). Rather, she lacks self-reflexivity. Her shattering seems to be based on trauma, she is childlike, repeating past events, and her suffering is “mute,” as Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 189; 205–206) also suggests.
Chapter 4: A Strange Atmosphere

Milka’s son is born: Auno’s mother helps with the birth and the child is nursed by the shopkeeper’s wife during the time Milka is ill. The community’s acts of help and kindness offer a chance of a future, at least for the child. 320

“Madness” is used in the novella as a symbol which points to cultural taboos, secrets, silences and traumatic experiences. It circulates in the village community: it spreads from the character of Kristus-Perkele, and destroys Anna, Auno, and Milka. Many of its meanings are formed in the framework of tragic literature in which the characters’ fates are sealed by unknown forces. However, the mythical frames of the text should not prevent us from recognizing and acknowledging Tabu as a story about sexual abuse.

4.4. The Strange Atmosphere and the Reader

Everything gets a new meaning. The environment is somehow different—not to a gross degree—perception is unaltered in itself but there is some change which envelops everything with a subtle, pervasive and strangely uncertain light. (Jaspers 1963, 98.)

The laws that regulate our shared world do not hold in Mukka’s storyworld: the actions of the characters make and do not make sense, things are true and not true at the same time. We are forced into a kind of double bookkeeping: to believe in two contradictory things at the same time and to move between two realms of meaning (see Sass 1994, 275; Ratcliffe 2017, 63; 153). I suggest that the “strange atmosphere” which readers can experience while reading Tabu is close to what Jaspers called a “delusional atmosphere” and what Ratcliffe connects to the development of trauma. It has two characteristics: a subtle change in the way the world is perceived and a “pervasive” and “unpleasant” feeling of uncertainty. (Ratcliffe 2017, 111.) As we have seen, Tabu portrays how the world changes around Milka and Anna. Traumatic events can be understood as a cause of their shattering, but they are never named as such explicitly. We are given the impression that Milka and Anna lose their minds because they lose the man they love, and we are even invited to join them in hoping for his return. However, the tragedy is bigger than the disappearance of one man. Ultimately, readers are left alone to reflect on the events, without a knowledgeable narrator or implied author to guide us. The “strange atmosphere” is also the readers’ construction, our version of a traumatic, delusional atmosphere, developed inside the protective aesthetic frame, but distressing nonetheless. It makes reading the novella unsettling and involves ambiguity about how to read the text: how can we enjoy the aesthetic qualities and reflect on the difficult ethical questions at the same time?

---

320 This interpretation requires that we ignore Mukka’s original plan that the son would ultimately die in the war (see Paasilinna 1988, 77).

As suggested earlier, the strange atmosphere has several sources which are tightly connected. It can be traced to the narrative and linguistic elements of the text and to its overall “style”: the prayers, the use of religious symbols and metaphors, the sensitive description of bodily experiences, and the lack of reflection. Readers have described this narrative style as “lyrical,” “archaic” and “detached” (see, e.g., Paasilinna 1988, 91; Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 189). The atmosphere could be characterized through the three overlapping main themes addressed in this chapter: 1) misreadings, or misunderstandings between the characters, the strange or unexplained acts and decisions they make, and the resulting uncertainty about what has happened and how to interpret the events; 2) the mythical base structure, the fictions, myths, and taboos the novella uses, which also underlie the characters’ interpretations, actions, and decisions, and which likewise make the text difficult to interpret; 3) uncertainty, or the way the experiences of trauma, suffering, and “madness” spread from one character to another and wrap the readers inside the traumatic uncertainty and loss of trust in the world.

To conclude, let us briefly look at these themes through a motif that has not been explicitly discussed so far: the unsettling logic of “exchange” that is visible in the story and emphasized by Milka’s strange decision to marry the cantor. Finally, I briefly discuss some extratextual and intertextual references which support the interpretation of the novella as a narrative of abuse and trauma.

As discussed, one source of the strange atmosphere is the way the characters make mistakes in their understanding and interpretation of one another and the events around them: there are Milka’s misunderstandings of Kristus-Perkele’s actions and her inability to perceive the relationship between him and her mother; Anna’s inability to perceive and understand the way her daughter changes and how she is abused by Kristus-Perkele; and both Anna’s and the cantor’s acceptance of the idea of the Immaculate Conception. The events of the novella and the way the story is pushed forward are strongly motivated by these mistakes, misreadings, misunderstandings, blind spots, and false beliefs, and they result in actions that often defy common expectations. For example, the description of Milka’s decision to marry the cantor invites an interpretation in which Milka is seen as acting blindly, like an actant in a predetermined plot.

The marriage has been interpreted in different ways. For example, Mäkelä-Marttinen suggests that Milka marries the cantor in her “sense of sin,” as compensation for her and her mother’s mistakes: “Milka repays the sin of her mother’s pride and having given herself [to Kristus-Perkele] by offering herself as a wife to the cantor.”

Further, Lahtinen suggests that Milka marries the cantor in order to avoid the shame brought by the pregnancy and to secure an income for herself and her mother (Lahtinen 2013, 70). It is true that the cantor’s prestigious position is mentioned in the text and we are shown the villagers’ respect for him, but otherwise there is no textual support for the interpretation other than “common sense”: marriage with the cantor would be a plausible reaction in Milka’s situation in the historical context of the events. However, in this very pragmatic line of thought, it would have been even more sensible to marry Auno, who is closer to her age, who is the heir of a wealthy farm, and whom Milka even seems to “like a little,” as she says. Lahtinen’s suggestion implies that Milka makes a conscious choice, but as we have seen, the text does not explain anything about the moment of the decision: Milka just finds her way to the cantor’s house in the rain, full of distress. As Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 188) notes, the marriage between the cantor and Milka is “uncanny.”

The readers have to infer Milka’s feelings of sin and shame, her possible ponderings about security and respect from everything else we are told, and we end up projecting different kinds of cultural narratives on her.

This brings us to the second main source of the strange atmosphere. Milka’s actions appear as strange, but also as highly symbolic: her decision-making seems unconscious and her actions are not depicted as calculated or rational, but they become meaningful in the context of the cultural narratives, myths and taboos that regulate intersubjective life and guide her movements. Milka’s act can be read as a sacrifice that is determined by the narrative form: she follows the narrative of a “fallen woman” and the way such acts are resolved in naturalist and realist stories. Since Milka does not die in the end, she must marry and/or go insane. She also follows the story in which the Virgin Mary is married to the older Joseph. Moreover, from a psychological perspective, Milka’s decision is “insane,” but it also makes sense in an unsettling way. It can be read as a symptom of trauma: Milka has no more ownership of her own body, it does not matter what is done with it. Or more precisely, the traumatic experience is re-enacted in her body and the way it is offered to the cantor.

Milka’s decision also underscores and sheds light on the other forms of “exchange” portrayed in the text: Kristus-Perkele gives Milka the coin after the first sexual act and the wooden ball before he escapes; Milka offers herself to

321 “Nyt raskaana oleva, rakastajansa hylkäämä Milka hyvittää oman antautumisensa ja äidin ylpeyden synnin tarjoamalla itsensä kanttorille vaimoksia.” (Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 188.)

322 “The uncanny marriage between Milka and the cantor drives the mother deeper to the madness; the young daughter has her lover’s child and is married to her suitor.” (“Milkan ja kantorin kummallinen liitto ajaa äidin yhä syvemmälle hulluuteen; nuori tytär saa hänen rakastajansa lapsen ja on naimisissa hänen kosijansa kanssa.”) (Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 188.)
Auno as payment for haymaking; and finally Milka gives herself to the cantor after her mother has rejected him. None of these exchanges are “rational” or “logical” in any common sense: they are not results of ordinary decision-making. They are rather consequences of different kinds of narratives: Milka’s and Anna’s love for Kristus-Perkele and their dream of marrying him, or of the cultural narrative according to which girls and women can be “owned” by men and their bodies can be transferred from man to man like commodities (see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 192). Milka’s and Anna’s experiences, decisions, and acts are deeply affected by the narratives of love and marriage which they seem to have internalized. At the same time, we can see how Kristus-Perkele’s actions are made possible by the taboos surrounding sexuality, the narratives of male ownership, and the religious narratives of temptation, sin, and shame.

The third main source of the strange atmosphere is the secret at the core of the story: the traumatic events which are described, but nonetheless ambiguous and invite conflicting interpretations. In addition to the textual evidence and phenomenological descriptions of trauma discussed above, the reading of Tabu as a story of abuse finds support from psychological and sociological research and personal narratives of abuse. It is often difficult for victims of sexual abuse to accuse their abusers, sometimes even to recognize being a victim of abuse, and feelings of shame and guilt are sometimes directed at oneself rather than the perpetrator. From an extratextual point of view, the culture of sexual abuse in secluded religious communities, like the ones Mukka was familiar with, creates an interpretative frame for the relationship between Milka and Kristus-Perkele that is very different from mythical and generic frames of reading. The reading of Tabu as a description of sexual abuse and trauma also sheds new light on Milka’s prayers. For example, social scientist Johanna Hurtig (2013) has discussed the ways Laestadian religious discourses were used in order to turn the shame involved in sexual violence on the victims in real-life cases of abuse in Lapland from the 1970s onwards. Similar processes can be seen at work in Milka’s story. Even if the first readers of the novella in the 1960s were not aware of the sexual abuse happening in the closed religious communities in Lapland when Tabu was written, twenty-first-century readers probably are. Moreover, the intertextual connection between Lolita and Tabu reminds us of the problems of stories which portray sexual violence ambiguously and leave interpretive responsibility to the reader. Whereas the narrator of Lolita is unreliable because he is the abuser and because he initially begins to tell his story to justify himself, the narrator of Tabu is unreliable because she is abused as a child and as an adult her mind is shattered. As a result, the events are not explicitly named as abuse, but from today’s perspective both novels are clearly stories about sexual violence.324

323 Also Lahtinen notices these exchanges but connects them Milka as a character who, in his view, represents “the irreconcilable conflict” between “the ideal and the real”: she is “a child and an adult,” “innocent and fallen,” “virgin and whore,” “good and bad,” “the Virgin Mary who loves the Christ” and “Judas who betrays the Christ” (Lahtinen 2013, 72).

In Tabu, Kristus-Perkele’s abuse of Milka becomes an open secret, a taboo. The characters know on some level that Kristus-Perkele is the father of Milka’s child but they close their eyes to the truth—and most importantly, they close their eyes to the fact that Kristus-Perkele is an abuser. Kristus-Perkele’s violence is only hinted at in the rumors in which the villagers accuse him of “bad things,” but the narrator frames this talk as evil gossip. Ultimately the abuse not only shatters the life of the victim, but the suffering and blame are spread around the community. Anna and even Auno become victims of Kristus-Perkele’s actions. Yet, at the same time, Anna and the cantor share some of the responsibility through their failures to protect Milka: Anna in her failure to see what is happening to Milka and in her tragic blindness when she falls in love with Kristus-Perkele herself; the old cantor in his desire to marry the fifteen-year-old girl and thus take the place of Kristus-Perkele (see also Mäkelä-Marttinen 2008, 190).

How should one then read a text like Tabu? The narrator offers no moral judgments, and this makes normative readings of the text, such as those that condemn Kristus-Perkele, more difficult (see also Oja 2004). But if we fail to recognize the sexual abuse of a child in the novella, we risk of normalizing sexual violence. From this perspective the early reviewers who condemned the sexual content and detailed descriptions of sex in Tabu were right from an ethical point of view, although for the wrong reasons—for condemning the sex but not the sexual violence. Mukka’s Tabu raises the same ethical question as Nabokov’s Lolita: what if readers fail to read these stories as descriptions of sexual abuse?

There are no easy answers to this. In Tabu’s case it is important to see that the text itself offers support for readings that recognize the abuse and trauma and that pay attention to the gender and power relations and to the oppressive and destructive religious discourses, narratives and myths that become visible in the novella. I agree with Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008) that the worldview in Mukka’s works is highly polyphonic and heterogeneous and that there are hints of criticism of the treatment of women.325 This, however, does not mean that Tabu could or should be read without paying attention to its ethics. The text 324 To be precise, Humbert Humbert does admit at the end of his story that he has destroyed Dolores’s life and implies that he is a rapist. On unreliability and ethics in Lolita, see Phelan 2005, 98–131, also 2007; Booth 1983, 391.

325 Mäkelä-Marttinen (2008, 190; 206) is optimistic: she suggests that through the ballad form combined with the naturalist description and the description of “Milka’s mute suffering,” Mukka manages to “portray the distortions created by the male attitude” and to criticize the role of women in the society (“onnistuu esittämään Milkan mykän ahdingon kuvaoksen avulla nimenomaan maskuliniisen asenteen vinoumia”).

245 might perpetuate sexual abuse: it is ambiguous, and it refuses to condemn the abuse, although condemnation may be seen as implied in the suffering of the characters. It is thus important to read Tabu against the myths, images, and narratives it uses. Returning to Mukka’s own idea about deconstructing myths in his works, it is possible to interpret Tabu as a text that breaks down the cultural myths and taboos that help to maintain the silence about sexual violence. But this means that we must read the novella as it is: a story about trauma and abuse.
CHAPTER 5
A Shattering World: Hallucinatory Spaces, Stories, and Images in Likaiset legendat

Schizophrenia pseudoneurotica
(Borderline case)

One shouldn’t actually read this, at least not at the coffee table. If you read, you won’t understand hardly anything. Or you might think: exactly, dirty legends. Or you will become anxious, very anxious. Or maybe you will understand.

I don’t know a lot about schizophrenia, not even enough to know if the words at the beginning are spelled correctly.

I don’t know about transference, about destructive dependence, about the self, about Maria. But still I and Maria, Maria and I know something: We know it, the Inside. We have been there.

We know a lot about something that you, Johannes, don’t know anything about.

But listen anyway.

No one in this book exists in reality, because not everything that is true is real.

Maria

Skitsofrenia pseudoneurotica
(Borderline case)

Minä en tiedä kovin paljon skitsofreniasta, en edes sen vertaa, että osaisin sanoa, onko alussa oleva kirjoitettu oikein.

Tiedämme paljon siitä, mistä sinä, Johannes, et tiedä mitään.

Kuuntele silti.

Tässä kirjassa kukaan ei ole todellisuutta, sillä kaikki, mikä totta on, ei ole todellisuutta.

Maria (LL 5.)
Maria Vaara’s autobiographical novel Likaiset legendat (The Dirty Legends, 1974) begins with a preface, a reading instruction which at first sight seems to be addressed to us, the readers of the text. We are warned about reading the novel, and the writer (the passage is signed “Maria”) anticipates our reactions: we might not understand anything, or we might reject the text altogether, thinking: “exactly, dirty legends.” The writer suspects that the story might cause us anxiety—take us somewhere we do not want to go. Or perhaps we would understand. The experiences depicted in the novel might even be familiar to us, and if not, the text might help us to understand them. In the end, however, the addressee gets a name, Johannes. The communication is doubled: Maria is writing to her psychiatrist, Johannes, as well as to us: anxious readers, understanding readers, perhaps fellow-sufferers of mental illness. She warns all of us about the dangers of reading but nonetheless urges us to listen. The instruction also reveals the two overlapping aims of the novel: to create a path for intersubjective communication and to convey experiential knowledge, knowledge about the “Inside” of schizophrenia.

The reading instruction can also be understood in the light of the novel’s socio-historical context. As discussed in Chapter 1, Vaara’s Likaiset legendat was one of the first autobiographical texts in Finland that openly discussed psychotic experiences and opened up a psychotic world to its readers. It is likely that Vaara felt a need to frame the text and give her readers some guidance. The preface also emphasizes the experiential, yet fictional nature of the text, as well as the tension between the actual and the hallucinatory worlds it depicts: nothing that is told is “real,” but nonetheless it is the “truth.” Unlike the three novels discussed in the previous chapters, Likaiset legendat is a work that is openly based on its author’s experiences. Furthermore, unlike Kaunis sielu, Tohtori Finckelman or Tabu, it underlines a psychiatric diagnosis: the first words, “Schizophrenia pseudoneurotica (borderline case),” offer a diagnostic label for the whole text, inviting us to read it through a psychiatric category. However, the diagnosis, and especially the stigma it carries, is contested in Vaara’s later novels, and already Likaiset legendat has a political, even antipsychiatric undertone: the novel shows the importance of a safe therapeutic relationship, but also reveals problems in mental health care and advocates for listening to the patients’ voices and experiences.\footnote{A common problem throughout the twentieth century—in addition to the fact that schizophrenia is in general a difficult illness to diagnose—has been that schizophrenia has been over-diagnosed, especially in women and in people of color (see, e.g., Usher 2012; Metzl 2009). Furthermore, the diagnosis can turn into a stigmatizing label (and an identity that is stigmatized) which in itself hinders the prognosis of the illness (see also Marrow & Luhrmann 2016). I refer to the protagonist’s experiences as “psychotic” rather than “schizophrenic” to leave the diagnosis more open.}

The first part of the novel focuses on Maria’s relationship with Johannes. It explores the phenomena of transference and destructive dependence which already appear in the preface. Part I is narrated mostly by a third-person narrator who has access to Maria’s mind, and who reports and reflects on her thoughts and emotions from the outside. However, occasionally the narrative mode changes into first person and character—Maria becomes a narrator who is writing about herself. The narration thus oscillates between third and first-person perspectives, looking at Maria’s experiences from the “outside” and the “inside” in turns. The second part of the novel consists of short hallucinatory stories which form the “dirty legends” of the title: in the “legends,” Maria is accompanied by figures like her mother, father, siblings, the Virgin Mary, baby Jesus, Saul and Paul, and Satan. Part II is written almost completely in the first person and it creates a psychotic experiential world, describing alterations in Maria’s experience of her body, sense of space and time, and loss of boundaries between perceiving, remembering, dreaming, and imagining.

In psychiatry, psychosis is usually characterized by its “positive” and “negative” symptoms which also form a significant part of the diagnostic criteria. Negative symptoms refer to experiences which seem to “lack” something—the flattening of emotions and inability to act—whereas positive symptoms are experiences which “add” something to regular experience, such as hallucinations and delusions. Vaara’s writing focuses mainly on the positive symptoms, and the negative symptoms are referred to only in passing, as the readers for example find out that Maria has been lying in bed although she has gone through different worlds in her experience. The narration is filled with voices and images which haunt Maria, descriptions of thoughts that feel as if they were “inserted” into her mind and delusions of being controlled from the outside. Maria complains about voices that “come uninvited” and goes through experiences of separation from herself: “I have gone away.” She is also disturbed by voices called “the scattered” which constantly mock and question her and bring forth experiences of shame and guilt. The experiences are characterized by a pervasive feeling of uncertainty about what is real and what is not: “What is going on with my sense of reality? It is as if there were too much of everything.”

Vaara’s portrayal of psychosis can be aligned with recent phenomenological accounts (see Parnas & Sass 2011; Sass & Pienkos 2013; Grünbaum & Zahavi 2013; Ratcliffe 2017). In phenomenological literature, psychotic experiences are often characterized as a loss of sense of agency and sense of reality, and they are understood particularly as problems of the “minimal self”—of the 327 See, e.g., DSM-5, 87–88.

---

328 “[T]ulevat kysymättä” (LL 100).
329 “[M]inä olen mennyt pois.” (LL 63.)
330 “Mitenkään todellisuudentajuni laita on? Kaikkea on ikään kuin liikaa.” (LL 37.)
most basic sense of self. There are changes in the way a person feels their own experiences as belonging to them and in the very basic experience of being immersed or present in the world. The phenomenologists propose that the alterations in the minimal self cause the inability to distinguish between what is real and what is not, leading to symptoms like delusions and to hallucinations. For example, hallucinations are thus understood as kinds of mistaken imaginings. Yet, compared to imagined things and objects, hallucinations feel real; they resemble perception, but do not really feel like perceptions either. Hallucinatory experiences are strange, ambiguous, or indeterminate: an “unfamiliar kind of intentionality,” as Ratcliffe (2017, 39) describes.

Another perspective that illuminates the experiences described in Vaara’s novel is the understanding of the contents of psychotic experiences as partly interpersonally formed. Already Freud in his “On Narcissism: Introduction” (1914/2012) suggested that hallucinatory voices could be understood as traces of the voices of other people, relatives, and authorities that have been internalized. In recent years, mental health advocacy groups like the Hearing Voices Movement have likewise emphasized how the experiences of distressing voices are tied to our relations with other people, for example to experiences of abuse and trauma (Romme & Escher 2012). In these views, hallucinatory voices and delusions are connected especially to traumatic events and circumstances, although there are also psychotic experiences that have more clearly neurological causes.

Combining the two views—the phenomenological understanding of psychotic experiences as problems of the minimal self and the emphasis on interpersonal trauma of the Hearing Voices Movement—Ratcliffe (2017, 30; 132) has recently suggested that the alterations in the minimal self and the development of certain kinds of hallucinations and delusions could occur due to a loss of trust in the interpersonal world that characterizes for example traumatic experiences. As discussed in the previous chapters, our experiences are to a large extent interpersonally regulated and supported, and Ratcliffe argues that our sense of reality—and, more precisely, our ability to know whether we have per-331 The minimal self, conceptualized by Dan Zahavi (e.g., 2007; 2010; 2014), refers especially to the experience of “for-me-ness”: the sense of being the subject and owner of one’s experiences.

---

332 There is a loss of borders between perception and imagination. The phenomenological view on hallucinations is also consistent with the analytical accounts (e.g., Currie 2000). As Currie (2000, 168) writes: “Imagination is a cognitive tool of great power, but it is also potentially a rather dangerous one.”

333 It is, however, important to note that Ratcliffe does not argue that all psychotic experiences involve traumatic experiences. On the links between trauma and psychosis, see Ratcliffe 2017, 170–181.
ceived, imagined, or remembered something—is partly guaranteed by other people with whom we share a common world.\textsuperscript{334} When trust in others and in the world is shattered, the ability to differentiate between different modes of intentionality can become compromised. In other words, hallucinations and delusions can be understood as disturbances in the sense of being in one or another kind of intentional state—as an erosion of the ability to differentiate between perception, imagination, and memory—due to a loss of trust in the others and the world. (Ibid., 184.) This understanding of psychotic experiences as a result of interpersonal trauma and loss of interpersonal trust also resonates with Vaara’s portrayal of psychosis, which emphasizes the role of painful relationships with others and traumatic events as a source of psychotic experiences, as we will see.

As its preface suggests, the explicit aim of \textit{Likaiset legendat} is to reveal what Maria calls the “Inside” of schizophrenia. However, researchers who have studied first-person accounts of illness have pointed out some of the epistemological problems involved in narrating one’s own experiences: there are problems in remembering and verbalization, and the narrative techniques and the aesthetic form can “distort” experiences (see Radden & Varga 2013, 100). An important question relevant to Vaara’s writing then is: What kind of knowledge can we gain from first-person accounts? And an even more important question here: What is the role of fictional and fictionalized accounts as forms of knowledge? Vaara’s whole novel responds directly to this challenge. It underscores the importance of experiential or non-propositional knowledge that is different from psychiatric knowledge, diagnostic and therapeutic notions and theories. As Rita Felski notes, literary fiction is able to create knowledge that is “more akin to \textit{connaître} than \textit{savoir}, ‘seeing as’ rather than ‘seeing that,’ learning by habituation and acquaintance rather than by instruction.” Felski also pays attention to the artistic constructedness of such experiential knowledge: “And yet the paradox lies in this sense of realness being achieved through artful means, with literature’s epistemological license allowing it to convey a uniquely multi-layered sense of how things are.” (Felski 2008, 93.)

Rather than creating psychiatric knowledge, Maria asks her readers to listen to her story. The novel conveys experiences to the readers in the sense that it invites us to attune to the text and to reflect on the experiences constructed in it. Vaara’s writing is guided by a belief in the possibilities of language to create experiential worlds and invite readers “inside” them, while it at the same time \textsuperscript{334} A simple, very concrete example of this would be a case in which I am unsure whether I have actually experienced or only imagined or dreamed something and then ask my friend for corroboration.

creates understanding of the artificiality and constructedness of the fictional minds and worlds, and of the limits of language and narration.335

In the following, I discuss how Vaara portrays experiences of losing one’s sense of self, sense of reality, and the distinctions between perceiving, remembering, and imagining. Furthermore, I look at the images and stories which construct the “dirty legends” of the novel’s title. I am particularly interested in how the psychotic experiential world is constructed and in the narrative techniques that Vaara uses to convey the experiences to the readers. In the first section, I focus on how the oscillation between first and third-person narration, the changes in perspective, and the different modes of consciousness presentation, metaphors, and typographical changes are used to communicate Maria’s experience of “losing” herself. In the second section, I show how the text creates hallucinatory spaces and solicits the readers’ “experiential background” (Caracciolo 2014a), including bodily experiences, experiences of being immersed in reality and in imaginary worlds, and our experiential, tacit knowledge of differences between perceiving, imagining, and remembering. In the third section, I discuss the unsettling content of Maria’s hallucinatory “legends” and how the stories are shaped by restrictive cultural narratives about the body and sexuality, but also how Maria uses the reenactment of the stories and images through writing as a form of therapy. In the final section, I outline the cultural work that Vaara’s text does and return to the questions of knowledge and understanding in reading about shattering minds and worlds.

5.1. The Loss of Self

– Why are you mad? Can you talk about it, Maria?
– I came to the reception as planned. But the office door was closed. Then I thought that I had perhaps come to the wrong place and I came to ask here at the outpatient clinic. […] The lively young woman was again here, and it seemed that she didn’t believe that I was the right person in the right place. I felt I was insane when I got the impression that you, Johannes, had never been in this building and that I had no chance of finding you here. That is what I thought and what Maria thought as well.

– Miksi sinä olet vihainen? Voitko puhua siitä, Maria?
– Minä tulin vastaanotolle niin kuin oli sovittu. Huoltotoimiston ovi oli lukittu. Sitten arvelin että ehkä olin tullut vääраan paikkaan ja tulin kysymään tääältä, poliklinikalta. […] Täällä oli taas pirteä nuori nainen, joka ei oikein tuntunut uskovasta, että olin oikea ihminen oikean paikan paikassa. Tunsin itseni heikkomieliseksi kun sain sen käsityksen, että sinä, Johannes, et ole 335 Especially Vaara’s second autobiographical novel, Kuuntele Johannes (Johannes, Listen, 1975), focuses on the difficulties of trying to verbalize one’s experience to another and on the limits of language.

The novel begins at a therapy session. Maria has arrived at Johannes’s reception but as she tells him, the office doors were locked and the people at the clinic seemed to not know anything. When she finds Johannes, she tells him that she felt “insane” when she was told that he was not there. In her account of the events, we also get the first hint of Maria becoming detached from herself. Johannes addresses her as “Maria” but in her speech she makes a distinction between “I” and “Maria”: “That is what I thought and what Maria thought as well.” She continues elaborating on her confusion to Johannes:

– But I stayed to wait for you, although even I started to feel that I was a wrong person in a wrong place. Soon I won’t even know my own name. In fact, I don’t know. I don’t know if I am Maria or the other or someone else. Sometimes I know everything very clearly.

The small blunder—not finding the person she was looking for and being mistreated by accident—triggers in Maria an experience of losing herself or becoming detached from herself. She describes to Johannes how the experience begins as a—quite common—feeling that she is the “wrong person in the wrong place” caused by the unfamiliar receptionist’s behavior. But then the feeling grows into uncertainty about herself: “I don’t know if I am Maria or the other or someone else.”

As we read further, it becomes clear that the separation between “Maria” and “I” is reflected in the structure of the novel: in the background of the passages in which Johannes and Maria are speaking is the extradiegetic third-person narrator. The structure is complex: the narrator (assumedly the “Maria” of the preface, whom we can also interpret as the implied author) is reporting the experiences of character-Maria (the “I” of the previous passages) who is talking to Johannes and at the same time looking at herself (a third “Maria”) as if from the outside. The structure reminds readers of the distinction between the narrating I and the experiencing I which characterizes all autobiographical and first-person narration, and at the same time it evokes the phenomenological experience of becoming detached from oneself: narrator-Maria is separated from character-Maria, and, from the perspective of character-Maria (who is at the reception talking about her experiences to Johannes) “Maria” is actually someone completely different. She is in other words separated from herself on the level of narration, but also on the level of the events.

Once the mistake about the reception has been cleared up, the narrator describes how Maria leaves Johannes’s office relieved, in a state of lightness and joy. “Maria” and “I” are coming back together:

She would have wanted to sing and fly and whistle and shout and embrace the whole world.
– I, Maria.
I can stay in a momentary feeling of happiness, but at some point, soon there will be a backlash, and it’s not good to fall from the heights, thought Maria.
It was raining, the ground was muddy, the leaves were flying, the wind was cold, and she liked even that.
– Let Maria swing for a while somewhere in the heights of the Milky Way
– it’s so easy to fall to the ground from there,” said a scattered, one of Them.

Hän olisi tahtonut laulaa ja lentää ja viheltää ja huutaa ja ottaa syluin kai-ken maailman.
– Minä, Maria.
Voin kyllä viihtyä tilapäisessä onnellisuuden tunteessa, kyllä se vastaisku tulee joskus ja pian eikä korkealta ole hyvä pudota, ajatteli Maria.
Vettä satoi, maa oli kurainen, lehdet lensivät, tuuli oli koleata ja hän piti siitäkin.
– Annetaan Marian vähän aikaa keinua jossakin Linnunradan korkeudella
– sieltähän on niin helppo pudota sitten maahan, sanoi irrallinen, yksi Niistä. (LL 11.)

The narrator reports Maria’s thoughts and the way she is now able to feel herself as herself. But the passage also introduces “the scattered” who suggest that Maria will soon fall from her heights. Throughout the novel, the scattered are voices of judgment whom the narrator reports saying things like: “– Maria, you are a child and sick and crazy, a scattered said”; “– You are very selfish, Maria, a scattered said.”; “– Your husband was a drunk, a scattered whispers.” The passage above shows how the text brings together and intermingles different voices and modes of presentation: there are passages of character-Maria’s quoted speech and thought, passages of narrated monologue in which narrator-Maria’s and character-Maria’s voices come together, Johannes’s quoted speech, narrator-Maria’s reports about character-Maria’s experiences, and the voices of the scattered.

As we read further, what becomes particularly interesting is the oscillation between third- and first-person perspectives (narrator-Maria’s and character-Maria’s). Since the narrator repeatedly records Maria’s speech and thoughts, the text contains a lot of first-person statements which are mostly signaled with dashes before character-Maria’s lines. The readers can thus quite easily separate narrator-Maria’s discourse from the speech and the quoted thoughts of character-Maria. However, gradually the borders between third-person and first-person perspectives start to become hazier:

Maria has been forced to be away from Johannes for three weeks. Why? She is going to ask it when she arrives. Three weeks is a long time. Maria thinks that it is a punishment.

I would like to find you immediately. I don’t want to look for you for long, Maria still thought in the train. I would like to use your actual name. I do not dare. What is going on with my sense of reality? It is as if there were too much of everything. Someone is talking and it is not Maria or I.

Marian on pitänyt olla poissa Johanneksen luota kolme viikkoa. Miksi? Hän aikoo kysyä sitä, kun tulee perille. Kolme viikkoa on pitkä aika. Maria ajattelee, että se on rangaistus.

Tahtoisin löytää sinut heti. En tahdo etsiä kauan, ajatteli Maria vielä junnassa. Tahtoisin käyttää sinun oikeata nimeäsi. En uskalla. Mitenkään todellisuudentajuni laita on? Kaikkea on ikaan kuin liikaa. Joku puhuu eikä se ole Maria enkä minä. (LL 37, emphasis added.)

In the passage, the third-person narration smoothly turns into character-Maria’s quoted thoughts as the paragraph changes. The narrator still signals when Maria’s thoughts are quoted with the tag “Maria still thought,” but the first-person sentences take control of the text. The passage is nonetheless easy to follow, although the perspective changes. In fact, a hasty reader might not even notice the change, and the overall sense of reading the whole novel could be that it is actually narrated in the first person.337 The shifts in perspective carefully signal the alienation and dividedness Maria goes through, but the shifts do not probably confuse readers or force them to distance themselves from the text: we easily attribute everything we are told to one Maria. In other words, although character-Maria feels that she is an “other” or “someone else,” the readers likely hold on to the idea that there is just one person, and the feelings of detachment are read and felt as signs of delusion. At the same time, the changes of perspective capture some of the phenomenal experience of being divided and detached from oneself.

337 This is also an effect of the figural third-person narration and the repeated use of narrated monologues in which the voices of the narrator and the character are intermingled, as in the citation on this page. Another factor which creates an impression of whole Likaiset legendat as a first-person narrated text is that at the end of Part I, the third-person narration stops, to be replaced by first-person narration.
In addition to the multitude of different perspectives and voices, Maria’s experience of splitting into many, shattering, and losing control of herself is enacted using metaphors and similes. Metaphors of being “too much” are found in the passage quoted above: “It is as if there were too much of everything. Someone is talking, and it is not Maria or I.” Later, Maria explains to Johannes her experience of shattering through images of “growing” and “walking on ice”: “My self, Maria, starts to scare me. It is as if I was growing into many directions which I don’t know and which I don’t want. As if I had to walk on thin ice further and further.”

In the first chapters of the novel, a more severe psychotic breakdown is constantly anticipated, and approaching the end of Part I, the narrator reports a sudden change for worse:

A culture week began in Paltamo, festively. Maria had to be involved, though only from the small part of the library. During that week something must have happened, and Maria could not cope any longer, she simply could not cope.

Paltamossa alkoi kulttuuriviikko, juhlallisesti. Marian oli pakko olla muikana, tosin kirjaston vähäiseltä osalta. Sillä viikolla kai tapahtui jotain, että Maria ei jaksanut enää, yksinkertaisesti ei jaksanut. (LL 55.)

The narrator is empathetic but seems not completely sure what is going on and why Maria feels the way she does. The narrated monologue (“she simply could not cope”) signals again the closeness between the narrator and the character and emphasizes the experience of confusion which Maria is going through and which the narrator cannot explain. After mentioning the culture week, the narrator records a dialogue between Maria and Johannes in which Maria tries to explain that she feels abandoned and that the therapy is not helping because afterwards she feels even more alone. During the session, one of the scattered says: “– Maria, it would be better if you were dead […].” The session then ends with an agreement that Maria can telephone Johannes while he is away for two weeks, and when Maria arrives home, she promises herself to stay alive until Johannes returns. The following chapter reports on the culture week in diary form: “1.5. May Day. I have just arrived from the May Day matinee […]. Now I am sitting at home, listening to records and crying. I don’t really know 338 This passage could perhaps be read as metafictional comment about the third-person narrator: character-Maria would be commenting on the narrating voice that is “talking” about her. However, very few passages in the novel suggest that character-Maria could hear narrator-Maria’s voice. On a similar and more consistent technique of constructing a sense of hallucinating through metalepsis in Muriel Spark’s The Comforters (1957), see Foxwell 2016.

339 “Oma itseni, Maria, alkaa pelottaa minua. Ihan kuin kasvaisin monen suuntaan, joita en tunne ja joihin en tahdo. Kuin olisi kuljettaa heikkoa jäättä yhä kauemmas ja kauemmas.” (LL 53.)
340 “– Maria, sinun olisi parasta olla kuollut, irrallinen sanoi.” (LL 57.)
why I am crying and who is crying. I think that I should call the municipal doctor, she’s the closest.” On the following page, Maria writes that she has tried to get help elsewhere and has not called Johannes. Then the diary is interrupted: there is a short dialogue, assumedly between Maria and the municipal doctor, in which a voice says: “– I have to get into hospital, I cannot go home.”

In the passage that follows directly after this, the narrator reports that Maria is admitted to hospital:

 Maria is in hospital, in Room 2, Ward 21. This is a psychiatric hospital and an open ward.

This looks like hell, but I still could not and dare not go home. I have been able to arrange a nurse for the children and a substitute at the library. I don’t have the strength to care about anything else.

Maria on sairaalassa, huoneessa 2, osastolla 21. Tämä on psykiatrinen sai-raala ja avo-osasto.

Tämä näyttää helvetiltä enkä kuitenkaan tahtois enkä uskaltaisi kotiin.
Olen vielä kyennyt siihen, että lapsilla on hoitaja ja kirjastossa sijainen.
Muusta en jaksa välittää. (LL 61, emphasis added.)

After the first short paragraph, the third-person narration stops again, and the voice of character-Maria continues the narration. The text has already been sporadic, but after this passage, it becomes even more fragmented. The diary form, the third-person narration and fragments of different dialogues are alternating, there are typographical changes and capital letters:

12.5.
I have heard Johannes’s voice. I called Uusikaupunki in the evening. It felt warm to hear a familiar and safe voice. I was not able to say anything else than: Do you like me?

I know that Johannes talks kindly like a doctor to a patient, but that voice touches me softly.

I HAVE HEARD JOHANNES’S VOICE.

And Maria stopped in that voice for a long time, perhaps forever. Maria does not know.

– Untuva, I cannot make Maria say anything, she is completely closed.
– I found some papers in her bedside table drawer. Do you want to read them, Johannes, said Untuva.

It is dark.

341 “1.5. Vapunpäivä. Olen juuri tullut vappumatineasta [...]. Nyt istun kotona, kuuntelen levyjä ja itken. En oikein tiedä, mitä itken ja kuka itkee. Minun kai pitäisi soittaa kunnanläääkärílle, hän on lähimpänä.” (LL 60.)

342 “– Minun pitää päästä sairaalaan, en voi mennä kotiin.” (LL 61.)
– Couldn’t somebody still help me?

Maria has gone away, I have gone away. The others have come.

JOHANNES HAS GONE SOMEWHERE FAR AWAY.

12.5.

Tiedän, että Johannes puhuu ystävällisesti kuin lääkäri potilaalle, mutta se ääni hipaisee pehmeästi.

OLEN KUULLUT JOHANNEksen ÄÄNEN.

Ja Maria pysähtyi siihen ääneen pitkäksi aikaa, ehkä lopullisestikin. Maria ei tiedä.

– Untuva, en saa Mariaa puhumaan mitään, hän on aivan sulkeutunut.
– Löysin hänens yöpöytänsä laatikoista joitakin papereita. Haluatko lukea, Johannes, sanoi Untuva.

Pimeää.

– Eikö joku voisi vielä auttaa minua?

Maria on mennyt pois, minä olen mennyt pois. Ne toiset ovat tulleet.

JOHANNES ON MENNYT JONNEKIN KAUAS POIS. (LL 63.)

The text creates an impression of a psychotic break. It moves from the diary form to third-person narration and to fragments of a dialogue (conversation between Johannes and the nurse, Untuva) and to the narrator’s short remark: “It is dark.” Then a voice, which the readers probably interpret as character-Maria’s, asks for help. Finally, the narrator reports that she is disappearing together with “Maria.” The final words, in capitals, reiterate one of the assumed triggers and basic experiences of the shattering, “JOHANNES HAS GONE SOMEWHERE FAR AWAY,” and the experience is emphasized by the chapter ending. After this scene, Part II begins, and the rest of the novel consists of dream-like hallucinatory stories which are situated partly in a hospital environment and partly in a hallucinatory, psychotic world. From a phenomenological perspective, the events of Part I reflect Ratcliffe’s (2017) description of a loss of trust in the world. Maria’s deep and constant experiences of being abandoned—from the small blunder at the reception to the break in the therapy—appear as triggers that cause the experiences of losing herself and ultimately result in full-blown psychosis.
Chapter 5: A Shattering World

5.2. The World of Psychosis

Part II of the novel is situated in the psychiatric hospital and narrated completely in the first person and mostly in the present tense, creating an impression of immediacy. The narrator-Maria who looked at herself from the outside in Part One has disappeared and we are inside the psychotic world of character-Maria (who is now narrating the events in the first person). The chapters are filled with hallucinatory spaces and images: the hallucinations carry Maria to different environments and to the past. Her body is going through transformations and there are sudden flashbacks of what can be interpreted as events from her childhood and marriage. The boundaries between perceiving, imagining, and remembering are becoming hazy, and readers are invited to follow the changes in the modes of intentionality (perception, imagination, and memory), bodily experiences, and sense of immersion in the world.

In the following sections, I focus on the ways Vaara’s text solicits the readers’ experiential knowledge of what it feels like to be immersed in the world and lose this comfortable, taken for granted immersion—or more precisely, our experiential knowledge of the different temporal profiles and different kinds of senses of presence in perception, memory, and imagination (see Ratcliffe 2017, 4). The narration creates an unsettling experiential world in which the basic experiences of being an embodied subject embedded in a shared reality have become altered, and the readers are invited “inside” this world.

Navigating Spaces

The first chapters of Part II reveal nightmarish stories in which Maria is a small child whose hands are cut off as a punishment for a sin. I discuss the contents and the characters (the Virgin Mary, Paul, Saul, Satan) of the stories shortly, but first let us focus on the construction of Maria’s experiential world. To do this, I discuss four scenes which depict alterations in Maria’s experience of her body, space, and time and which invite the readers to enact hallucinatory experiences based on their experiential knowledge of being bodily agents situated in the world.

Starting from Chapter 5 of Part II, Maria has “arrived” in a new place, or more precisely on a new “level” of reality. She is beginning to reflect on the psychotic environment and, simultaneously, what it is like to be on the psychiatric ward. The two realities are overlapping:

343 Only the first “dirty legend,” which recounts the story of how Maria loses her hands, is narrated in retrospect.
It is best to see what it is like here while one still can. I would of course open my eyes and look the regular way, but naturally one cannot do that here. One must choose a different way. I have hands, they are strange though, but they are hands nonetheless.

The wall seems to be close. I can always touch. I stretch out my arm. The hand moves in the water like a pondweed. Slimy, brownish green fingers. I cannot reach the wall. It escapes from touch like a quiver of the eyelashes.

I pick up speed and swim. There is space since the arm cannot reach. I bump into the strong, solid wall: my fishhead is dizzy for a while. What a strange oven [uuni] this is! Round, soft, full of water. I laugh. I am not a fish. I am not even a fish dish. And this is not an oven [uuni]. This is a dream [uni]. A fish has no fingers or toes; therefore I am not a fish.

It’s actually sinful to be here. Somehow I know that. There has been drumming and dancing all night.

On oikeastaan syntistä olla täällä. Jollakin tavalla minä tiedän sen. On rummutettu ja tanssittu koko yön. (LL 89.)

First, the deictic pronoun “here” evokes a sense of space. The narrator then describes changes in her body: she cannot look “the regular way” but she can use her hands to find out what it is like in this new place. She has new, strange hands with which she tries to touch the wall, but it disappears “like a quiver of the eyelashes,” and she begins to swim in the underwater space. At the end of the passage, the narrator has a realization that she is not a fish after all (“A fish has no fingers or toes; therefore I am not a fish”) and that she is actually dreaming. The passage has a dream-like, associative logic and there is also a play with the Finnish words uuni and uni: the narrator understands that she is not in an “oven” (uuni), but in a “dream” (uni)—the confusion seems to be caused by the similarity of the words.

The way she describes perceiving the environment through touching and moving comes close to the phenomenological and enactivist understanding of perception as action: perception is a touch-like process in which a person moves in their environment and gains a sense of presence of the world through interaction with it. The experience of the world as present and accessible to us, in other words, does not just happen when we open our eyes but rather, we achieve it: we make it happen or enact it using our sensorimotor skills (see Noë 2004, 1–2). Cognitive narratologists have also used the enactivist view of perception as an analogy to readers’ experience of storyworlds: the storyworld becomes present to us through our interaction with the affordances provided by the text. Vaara’s passage invites us to imagine and reflect on these processes of perceiving the world around us. At the same time, the passage also reminds us of its own fictionality, for example through references to dreaming and linguistic associations which co-create the sense of space: in a very concrete manner, the words help Maria to distinguish whether she is inside an “oven” or in a “dream.” Naturally, since we are engaging with a literary text, the words create the sense of space in the readers’ imagination.
Chapter 5: A Shattering World

The scene continues with a long description of different bodily transformations and a “sinful” dance with the Virgin Mary, the scattered and Satan. Finally, at the beginning of Chapter 6, after the dance, the narrator announces that she has “arrived.” “Once one has danced enough, one finally arrives. Here, where there are dirty window panes made out of strong glass and twenty-four small squares in each. They have counted me many times and always there are twenty-four of us.” Elements of the real world—the dirty window panes of the psychiatric ward—are intermingled with Maria’s hallucinations. The narrator tells that the panes are counting her, and there are also twenty-four of her.

344 As such, visual perception is often compared to the way a blind person perceives using a cane. The view of perception as action also means that perceiving is not a question of creating “mental pictures” or “representations” in one’s head. The visual field is fragmented, and we experience the world we see as a whole thanks to our knowledge of sensorimotor skills. (Noë 2004.) The enactivist theory of perception draws especially on Gibson’s (1979) theory of affordances and Merleau-Ponty’s (2002) phenomenology of the body.

345 When we read, we are invited to imagine (or “enact”) the storyworld on the basis of the cues provided by the text. As Evan Thompson (2007, 138) writes, in imagination “we do not experience mental pictures, but instead visualize and object or scene by mentally enacting or entertaining a possible perceptual experience of that object or scene.” Following Thompson, Caracciolo (2013, 81) suggests that narrative texts—e.g., descriptions of scenes, objects, and characters—are “sets of instructions for the enactment of a storyworld.” It is worth noting that we of course can create mental images, but this is in no way necessary for imagining (see also Hutto 2015).

346 This is in line also with the enactivist view of fictionality discussed, e.g., by Polvinen (2016 and 2017).

347 “Kun tanssii kyllikseen, tulee lopulta perille. Tänne, jossa on likaiset ikkunat lujaa lasia ja kaksikymmentäneljä pieniä ruutua jokaisessa. Ne ovat laskeneet minut monta kertaa ja aina meitä on kaksikymmentä neljä.” (LL 94.)

348 To be precise, the experience of being “counted” by window panes is more like a delusion than a hallucination.
In chapters 6 to 11, the narrator guides her readers around the psychiatric ward and different psychotic spaces. Each chapter begins by locating us, describing some small detail of the environment and explaining what is happening. Vaara builds the storyworld so that it can be shared and imagined by the readers: we constantly know where we are, but at the same time the environment becomes strange and the different realities are overlapping.

Let us now look at some of the ways that the readers are invited to reflect on and enact the psychotic world. Chapter 7 begins with a note that “Paul won’t come today. Saul will.” Saul (from the Bible) then takes the narrator outside and we are invited to imagine a park inhabited by human-like creatures:

There are many swings in the park. People are sitting in them. Are they people? People have eyes. Most of them have no eyes, only smooth, white faces. They have mouths; one must have a mouth. Hunger lives in the mouth. And they are all hungry. They also have noses. A nose smells dirty things. One must have ears in order to collect voices, to salvage them.

There is no lack of voices here; one must be careful not to step on them or not to walk through one by accident. One of the eyeless is running with a butterfly net trying to catch the voices. I wish they would be able to get their nets full.

Mother has said that there are no voices and that one should not listen to them, but the voices are there. They come even uninvited. Here, where there are white coats, no one is surprised. At home one always had to be careful not to talk to the voices so that someone could hear. Then one would get hit or one’s hair pulled.

The narrator describes seeing people in the park, but the human-like creatures have no eyes. Instead, they have “hungry mouths,” noses that “smell dirty things” and ears that “collect voices.” As in the earlier scene, the narration and the events are simultaneous: we are in the present moment and there is hardly any distance between the narrating I and the experiencing I. The description evokes disturbing images and sensory experiences: the multitude of transformed bodies and the fear of walking over and crushing the voices thematize the chaotic experience of hearing voices. The detailed description of the scene creates an impression that it is “real”: the narrator invites us to imagine perceiving the park, the swings, and the eyeless people. Yet the content of the scene resembles a dream, and it then seems to take the form of a memory: the narrator remembers how the mother said that “there are no voices,” that one “should not listen to them” and that one had to be careful at home not to talk to the voices because “one would get hit or one’s hair pulled.” At the same time, the theme of hearing voices connects the scene to the psychotic world and hallucinations. Readers are thus invited to reflect on the different modes of intentionality evoked in the passage: on the differences between perceiving, imagining, dreaming, remembering, and hallucinating and on the moves from one way of relating to the world to another.

349 “Paulus ei tule tänään. Saulus tulee.” (LL 100.)
Chapter 5: A Shattering World

As enactivist theories suggest, the different modes of intentionality are structurally similar: remembering, imagining, and dreaming are all forms of reenacting (or simulating) past perceptions, and in this sense, there is no intrinsic difference between them (see Noë 2004; Hutto 2017). However, the phenomenal experience of the different modes of intentionality is quite different, and in regular circumstances we are usually able to distinguish without any effort whether we are perceiving, remembering, or imagining something. This is because perception, memory, and imagination have very different kinds of temporal profiles (or “anticipatory-fulfillment structures” as Ratcliffe puts it) and they involve different kinds of experiences of presence (Ratcliffe 2017, 4; 123). When we remember or imagine something, we practically always know what is going to happen next in our memories and imaginings, whereas things that are perceived can also be surprising: we might of course guess what is, for example, behind a door before we open it, but we might be wrong. At the same time, imaginings and memories are similar in the way we experience their content as present: we know that the people we imagine or remember are not actually in the same space with us. In this way imagination and remembering are experientially very different from perception: the things we perceive appear as present in the same space with us, as reachable and touchable (for example by moving or imagining moving our bodies, we could reach something that we see). Further, imagination is different from both remembering and perceiving as it can create “spatially and temporally unstructured scenarios” that may be very different from anything that is “remembered, currently perceived, or anticipated, but without any sense of potential or actual discrepancy or surprise,” as Ratcliffe (2017, 4) illustrates.

In the passage above, the narrator describes perceiving the park environment as if it were real: the eyeless people are present in the same space with her and there is a sense of uncertainty and surprise. Yet, at the same time, the readers
Fictions of Madness

(and the narrator) know that eyeless people do not exist. The scene is unsettling and strange: it is perception-like and at the same time resembles imagining or dreaming. As discussed, hallucinations are characterized by a feeling of in-between-ness: they are ambiguous, strange experiences, somewhere in between imagination, memory, and perception (Ratcliffe 2017, 39). This feeling of ambiguity is often referred to as “double-bookkeeping”: in many psychotic states the experiencers themselves are aware that what they are experiencing is not real, yet it feels real (see Sass & Pienkos 2013; Ratcliffe 2017).

The ambiguity is enacted in Vaara’s text through the description of the unsettling eyeless creatures inhabiting the environment. The description of their appearance, “hungry mouths,” noses “that smell dirty things,” ears that “collect voices,” invites sensory imagination in us: enactment of seeing, hearing, tasting, and smelling. We are invited to imagine and reflect on a situation in which the “normal” ways of perceiving have become altered and replaced by a psychotic logic. Even if we have no experiential knowledge of hallucinations, we can enact the ambiguity of the perceptual experience described in the scene, and thus get a sense of the distress it causes. In other words, when we imagine the creatures in Vaara’s text, we are invited to enact an experience of distress involved in psychosis.

Likewise, the text invites us to imagine the alterations in Maria’s bodily experiences. From the creatures in the park, the narrator moves back inside the hospital. In Chapter 8, she is going through a bodily transformation and at the same time the voices of a figure called Annaliina and the scattered connect her to the real world and tell her (and the readers) what is actually happening:

The corridor looks like a long blood vessel. Resilient and firm. I suppose I am some kind of a red blood cell then.

– Don’t you think about those things of yours, Annaliina says. She has leisure time and has come for a visit. – You’re supposed to be a human being who knows how to put their shoes on the right feet and keep their apron clean.

But the scattered drag her away in a triumphal procession. She and her apron do not belong here.

I am. I am inside the red blood. Suddenly it floods inside me, my hands become redder and redder. Gallons of red billowing behind my eyes. I am inside the blood vessel and the blood is in me.

– Where do the broken pieces on the floor come from?

Someone is breaking coffee cups and slitting chair covers with a nail file. Who have they let in here raging? Usually there are only kind people here, staring, filled with medicine from head to fingertips. It has to be someone from the other ward.

– It’s you they mean, one of the scattered laughs. – It’s you.

It cannot be me. Mother spansk me if a cup breaks down by accident, and now the floor is filled with broken dishes.
Chapter 5: A Shattering World

At first, Maria is a blood cell moving in a corridor/blood vessel, but her movement is constantly disrupted by different voices pulling her back toward reality. On the one hand, the bodily description (“Suddenly it floods inside me, my hands become redder and redder”) invites us to respond by enacting the sensorimotor patterns we are familiar with through perception (see Caracciolo 2014a, 102). On the other hand, the description of bodily experiences is interrupted by the dialogic elements: the voices. The narrator notices someone breaking coffee cups and slitting chair covers, but as the scattered tell her, it is actually her. Again, we can see how the psychotic world and the psychiatric ward are intertwined. After this, the narrator tells us how “white men take my arms” and how she is pulled into a “grave”: we can interpret that Maria is being tied to a hospital bed, but in the hallucination the event is felt as a form of torture— as an experience of being buried alive.

The final scene I discuss here reveals even more clearly how different levels of time and space become overlapped in the text and how the present and the past become intertwined using a bodily metaphor. In Chapter 9, we are first on the level of the psychiatric ward and everything is very normal and mundane. The patients and the nurses are making Christmas decorations:

Everyone is sitting in the day room and working. Even the nurses aren’t playing cards now. We are working obediently. No one can dance now. We will get money and then we get to take a trip to Onkamo and then we can play itsy-bitsy spider again.

Untuva puts a needle in my hand, offers me a long thread and a pile of golden circles. Stars. I feel pity piercing the beautiful star.

---

350 “Valkeat miehet tarttuvat käsivarsiini.” (LL 107.)
I prick a hole with the needle. When the first star is pierced, the scattered images and voices are cut loose. I am such a big girl now that the hemline of my skirt has been lengthened and I can use the apron that Annaliina has left.

The passage brings again together actual and imaginary spaces and different modes of intentionality. The narrator describes how she pierces a golden star and “the scattered images and voices are cut loose.” First the narrator is at the ward, but then she suddenly moves into a past in which she is a small girl. The piercing of the star functions as a metaphor for the experience of moving into another reality and it invites readers to imagine the experience of the world suddenly changing.

There are several techniques through which Vaara’s text creates the psychotic experiential world and conveys it to readers. First of all, the text solicits readers’ experiential knowledge of what it feels like to perceive, imagine, dream, and remember. The text guides us to imagine situations and scenarios in which it becomes uncertain in which intentional state we are in. Different ways of relating to the world are packed together, forming an amalgam-like structure and piercing one another. Secondly, the descriptions of the alterations in space, time, and bodily experiences invite us to reflect on the ways Maria’s sense of immersion in the world and her experience of her own body is altered. The text also uses bodily images and metaphors to evoke a sense of alterations in embodiment, and to thematize the experience of hearing voices and of movement in different realities. Finally, the different perspectives and voices enact the dividedness and multiplicity of Maria’s selfhood. The scenes are unsettling and to some extent chaotic, but there is also an embodied and spatial logic that they follow, and it is easy to become immersed in the environments they construct.

It is, however, important to emphasize that the sense of experientiality constructed in narratives is always dependent on the readers’ experiential background. The experiences are created in interaction between the reader and the text, and it is impossible for a reader to experience something that is not based on her own experiences of embodied being in the world. As philosopher Daniel Hutto explicitly states:

The only way to understand ‘what-it-is-like’ to have an experience is to actually undergo it or re-imagine undergoing it. Gaining insight into the phenomenal character of particular kinds of experience requires practical engagements, not theoretical insights. This kind of understanding “what-it-is-like” to have such and such an experience requires responding in a way that is enactive, on-line and embodied or, alternatively, in a way that is reenactive, off-line and imaginative – and still embodied. It involves undergoing and/or imagining experiences both of acting and of being acted upon. (Hutto 2006, 52; see also Caracciolo 2014a, 99.)

Understanding what something is like requires going through this experience either in real life or in one’s imagination based on one’s past experiences. This also means that a literary description cannot evoke the phenomenal experience of, for example, hallucination, if a reader has never experienced hallucinations herself. In other words, a hallucination in itself cannot be reenacted if an experience of hallucination is not a part of the reader’s experiential background. Instead, the text can play with different modes of intentionality and invite us to connect experiences in new ways. For example, Caracciolo (2014a, 99) emphasizes the readers’ imaginative ability to create new experiences: engagement with fiction triggers and reorders past experiences, thus creating new ones. Reading Vaara’s text, however, it becomes clear that even more important than “triggering” experiences is that we are invited to reflect on our experience of being in the world and to see it in new ways. In other words, although experiences cannot be “shared” in the sense of going through the same experience as another person, reading can make us attune to the others and the world differently. We cannot step outside our own bodies, and engaging with fiction is not about simulating others’ experiences. Rather, a connection to another person can be created through constructing worlds for us to share, and I argue that this is what Vaara’s text does: it invites us to share unsettling experiential worlds.

Shared and Forbidden Worlds

As discussed in earlier chapters, our very basic understanding of others is not based on theoretical inferences or simulation of others’ experiences, but rather we understand one another through the worlds and stories we share (see Gallagher & Zahavi 2012, 213–215). Vaara’s text invites us to share a world that is unfamiliar to us. The long descriptions of the hallucinatory spaces in Part II offer us experiential knowledge of a different kind of world than the one we inhabit in our day-to-day lives. At the same time, the text reveals in a very painful way that this is a world which is denied and forbidden by many people.

In Chapter 10, Maria describes the voices she hears as “dirt” that nonetheless cannot be avoided:

> I pour the rest in the dust bin. The vacuum cleaner is humming. Elsa makes everything clean. I am going to be nasty. I know that once everything has Once again, the passage creates a packed moment which brings several realities together: there is a figure called Elsa (who is apparently based on Maria’s home help) and the narrator as “ma’am,” and the narrator as a child who is playing with the voices and disturbing Elsa. The real, imagined, remembered, and hallucinated are again intertwined and connected to the idea of a child playing. The passage includes a lesson: one has to learn to live with the “dirt,” with the scattered. But the doctor tells not to let them loose, and when they escape, her mother spanks Maria.

Different kinds of traumatic experiences in the background of the hallucinatory stories and spaces begin to be revealed. Maria repeatedly returns to the way her mother reacts to the voices she hears. On the one hand, she knows that the voices are extraordinary and important: she has an inner world that others do not have, and she cannot escape it even if she wanted to. On the other hand, her mother denies the existence of the voices inside her. In an earlier scene, Maria mentions that her mother treats her differently to “others” (assumedly her siblings):

The others. They cannot see anything or hear anything. They don’t have Paul or the Priest, Annaliina or the Virgin Mary or the scattered.
– They don’t know anything, because they cannot hear what I hear and see, I think arrogantly.
I wonder why mother likes more those who cannot hear and see, those who have no people of their own?
Chapter 5: A Shattering World

– He eivät tiedä mitään, koska he eivät kuule niitä, mitä minä kuulen ja näen, ajattelen ylimielisenä.

Mikähän siinä on, että äiti pitää enemmän niistä, jotta eivät kuule eivätkä näe, joilla ei ole mitään omia ihmisää? (LL 77.)

The narrator constantly returns to the mother’s hostility toward her and to the physical punishments. She even feels that her mother would have wanted her to die because of her difference: “Mother always secretly wished that I would die because I was filled with voices and images, and they often came forward. I knew that, I had always known.” 351 The text leaves it unclear whether Maria used to experience hallucinations already as a child. Nonetheless, an image has emerged of the mother as an austere and punishing character, someone who treats everything different as “sinful.” There is violence in refusing to share—or even to accept—the world of another person, even if it were different and unsettling.

In the moments of “deepest psychosis,” the usually quite coherent narrative form of the “dirty legends” is broken, and the focus is completely on the experiences of embodiment, space, and movement. The metaphorical and poetic language conveys the way Maria is multiplied, shattered, and nested inside herself. In these moments, the first-person narrator is sometimes looking at herself from the outside, but then she too gives in:

Maria is far away, deep inside. Let it take her and swing her where it wants to. I won’t object. I have no strength left anymore. The one with the velvet coat is stretching me like a string. Grimacing shiny teeth on a violet wall.

I go inside the forest. Inside the mushroom. I eat mushrooms, because they are full of sin. I bite them so that the juice is pouring down the corners of my mouth. Green juice.

– I am hungry, I am hungry. They have left me outside inside and this is full of me and my forest.

The poison spreads quickly. Green juice instead of red blood and you are free imprisoned free so deep that one cannot go deeper inside.

I go inside Maria and inside myself I eat myself I dig into the red mouth and I arrive.

Maria on kaukana syvällä sisäpuolella. Antaa sen viedä ja keinuttaa minne tahtoo. En pane yhtään vastaan. Ei minulla ole voimiakaan enää. Sametti-nutuin venyttää minua kuin naruaan. Irvisteleviä kiltäviä hampaita violetinvärisellä seinällä.

Minä menen metsään sisälle. Sieneen. Minä syön sieniä, sillä ne ovat syn-

351 “Äiti aina toivoi salaa minun kuolevan, koska minussa oli ääniä ja kuvia, ja ne tulivat usein esiin. Kyllä minä sen tiesin, olin aina tienyt.” (LL 110.)
Fictions of Madness

— Olen nälkäinen, olen nälkäinen. Ne ovat jättäneet minut ulkopuolelle sisäpuolelle ja tämä on täynnä minua ja minun metsääni.

Myrkky leviää nopeasti. Vihreätä mehua punaisen veren tilalle ja olet vapaa vangittu vapaa niin syvällä ettei sisemmälle voi enää mennä.

Minä menen Marian sisään itseni sisään syön itseni pureudun punaiseen suuhun ja pääsen perille. (LL 167.)

Such passages signal the moments of deepest psychosis, ones in which Maria is “far away.” Yet the moments are also rebellious: she is hungry (like the eyeless creatures) but she sates her hunger and eats the mushrooms that are “full of sin.” In the forest, inside the mushroom and inside herself, she has “arrived.” Such descriptions and passages in which both the narrative and grammatical structure is broken evoke a sense of a complete disappearance of any outside world, yet they are affective and meaningful. I have so far looked at the ways Vaara’s text invites our bodily and affective responses and our experiences of perceiving, dreaming, imagining, and remembering in order to share the psychotic experiential world. Now, let us look more closely at the content of Maria’s psychotic stories: the events and characters depicted in them.

5.3. Fictions of Psychosis

We assembled in an old brewery room and the scattered locked the door. I had received a red invitation card that was stamped with Paul’s thumb. From that I knew that I had to come.

Of course I knew why I was invited, the scattered did warn me on the way and told me that when Paul decides to do something, it will be done.

Everyone was already inside: Paul, the Virgin Mary, the scattered and I.

Vanhaan panimohuoneeseen me kokoonnuimme, ja irralliset panivat oven lukkoon. Minä olin saanut punaisen kutsukortin, jossa oli Paavalin peukanalonmerkki. Siitä tiesin, että oli pakko tulla.

Tiesihän minä, miksi kutsuttiin, irralliset kyllä varoitivat matkalla ja kertoivat, että minkä Paavali päätää, se myös tehdään.

Sisällä olivat jo kaikki: Paavali, Neitsyt-Maaria, irralliset ja minä. (LL 67.)

As discussed, the second part of the novel consists of “dirty legends”: the voices Maria occasionally hears in Part I are extended into longer stories which reflect strict religious and cultural narratives of sin, sexuality and punishment. In the first one, Maria is invited to an old brewery room where her hands are cut off on a wooden log. St. Paul has invited her to the ceremony, and he, the scattered and the Virgin Mary take part in the execution.

Anthropologist Tanya Luhrmann (2011) and her colleagues have studied psychotic experiences in different cultures, and the research suggests that in Western countries, hallucinatory voices tend to be disconcerting, violent and disturbing compared to, for example, India where the voices often take a more comforting tone and are more benign and easy to live with (see also Marrow & Luhrmann 2016). The results resonate with the common Western folk psychological conception of hallucinatory voices as bad and disturbing, and, as we have seen, also in Likaiset legendat many of the voices are violent and connected to distressing experiences. As Luhrmann (2011, 71) notes, hallucinations are highly influenced by culture: they are “a vivid illustration of the way culture affects our most fundamental mental experience and the way that mind is shaped both by cultural invitation and by biological constraint.” The anthropological evidence suggests that in cultures in which psychotic and hallucinatory experiences are less stigmatized and more accepted as normal, albeit unsettling, also the contents of the voices become less troubling (see Marrow & Luhrmann 2016).

Vaara’s text introduces comforting and protecting voices and images, but they are in a minority: the stories are controlled by the figures of the mother, Saul, Satan, and the scattered, who punish and mock Maria, and the consoling figures like the Virgin Mary and the father are subject to them. The stories also reflect the idea that hearing voices is something shameful and should be hidden: the mind is “leaking” into the world and this is understood as something bad and unwelcomed (see also Luhrmann 2011). Especially the mother figure of Maria’s stories conveys cultural norms, such as the idea that there is something wrong in Maria because of her voices, as we have seen.

Furthermore, the “dirty legends” constantly bring up different religious intertexts. Maria’s hallucinatory images are shaped by biblical stories and they reveal the power of cultural narratives in shaping the ways we experience. For example, Chapter 4 is a rewriting of the story of the Roman soldiers looking for baby Jesus: Maria is forced to hide the infant inside her womb to protect him from the soldiers. Also the story of Saul’s conversion is referred to throughout the novel: Maria regularly meets either Saul (Saulus), who makes her do “Satan’s work,” or St. Paul (Paulus/Paavali), who is a just and forgiving figure, someone who conveys love but also punishes. The contents of the “legends” could thus be read in the context of religious hallucinations and mysticism: the hallucinatory stories bring together religious and psychotic experiences and point toward a similarity between them. However, the difference is in their distressing content: what makes the experiences psychotic rather than religious is the effect they have on Maria (see also Luhrman 2011). The stories and images that Maria goes through are filled with experiences of shame and guilt, but as we will see, she also uses them to help her recover and fights against the stigma connected to them. In the following, I first discuss the distressing content of the “legends” and then their therapeutic functions.
Fictions of Madness

Legends of Shame and Guilt

Let us first take a closer look at the story in which Maria loses her hands, in Chapter 1 of Part II. The narrator describes the events:

It felt safe and solemn and I knew that what would happen would be good and right for me. Even mother would be content and the Priest. […]

Without fear I placed both of my hands on the block, and whispers drew my sleeves up. The wrist was ridiculously pale and white. But the hand was big and clumsy. […]

Soon it would happen. The tubs held their breath, the scattered were ready waiting for Paul’s orders, and the Virgin Mary knew what she would have to do soon.

– Now, said Paul gently and kindly.

I knew that at that moment the scattered took into use all of their extra hands and grasped the ax. Together they were powerful, and they had the strength to do it.

– Do it, urged Paul.

I felt a burning flash go through my wrists and a red smell filled the room and covered the strong smell of the tubs.

A cloth was lifted from my eyes and I saw that there were two white, loose hands on the log. The scattered were drying the puddles of blood with their extra hands and with the winding sheets that were no longer needed.

Paul said solemnly: – My child, now it has been atoned. We will not leave you handless and the Priest and your mother will be very happy.

In the scene, Paul orders the scattered to cut off Maria’s hands. The act is described with sensory detail and readers are invited to imagine the smells of the brewery room and Maria seeing the two white hands on the log when the cloth that covers her eyes is taken away. The passage then continues by revealing the reason for the mutilation, and the hallucinatory world is for a moment conflated.
Chapter 5: A Shattering World

with a possible memory: “Already long ago, when I was still little and played under the blanket, mother had warned and anticipated that this would happen. Father was mad, he would not have wanted mother to talk like that, but I saw that his head was hurting and that he could not stay straight for a long time.”

It is suggested that Maria has masturbated as a child: her mother has threatened her, and her father has failed to protect her. The hallucinatory story thus appears to reenact a partial memory and it reveals a shame that is connected to sexuality: a cultural narrative about sexuality and shame is manifested in the hallucinatory story. However, at the end of the scene there is also a sense of relief and atonement as Maria gets new hands and is “forgiven.” The Virgin Mary sews new hands for her:

– Virgin Mary, you are good with your hands and you know better how to do this. Now make it ready, said Paul and walked in purposeful strides next to the tub to wait.

I felt again a warm presence. I knew that Mary was close. I saw a silver needle and some shiny white cotton thread in the eye of the needle. I knew that slender, smooth hands sewed with deft movements a new pair of hands in place of the old ones, exactly the way hands should be. The seam became neat, almost invisible.

Now I had new hands, and the loose ones were waiting for Paul’s orders on the log. […]

The song ended. Paul looked at me with his pervasive eyes and said:
– Your mother can no longer punish you for it, you have now new, clean hands. You can go and drink a glass of hot tea. Tell also the priest that now it is done, and you are forgiven. […]

Something very important had happened. Now I could go back to the other children, mother would no longer be angry, and I would get a glass of tea at the same time as the others. Father would understand. I would tell him everything once the others went out and together we would wonder where my real hands would fly.

Maybe I would see them one day.

– Neitsyt-Maaria, sinä olet taitava käsistäsi ja osaat tämän paremmin. Tee se nyt valmiiksi asti, sanoi Paavali ja käveli määrätietoisesti sammion laidalle odottamaan.

Nyt minulla oli uudet kädet, ja irralliset odottivat pölkyn ympärillä Paavaliin käskeyä. […]

Laulu taukos. Paavali katsoi minuun läpitünnevilla silmillään ja sanoi:

352 “Jo kauan sitten, kun olin vielä pieni ja leikin peiton alla, äiti oli varoittanut ja ennustanut, että näin oli tapahtuva. Isä oli siitä vihainen, hän ei olisi tahtonut äidin näin puhuvan, mutta isän päätä särki eikä hän jaksanut kovin pitkään ryhdistäytyä.” (LL 70.)
The passage shows the different forms that hallucinatory experiences can take: hallucinations are not necessarily auditory or visual, but here the Virgin Mary is only felt as a warm presence. The hallucinatory story itself seems to be constructed out of a combination of imagination, cultural narratives, and traces of memory—and as such, it resembles a dream or a nightmare. There are complex experiences of pain and shame combined with a feeling of atonement. The whole story follows the structure of religious absolution or sacrifice. In the end, Maria dreams how she and her father would think together about her hands which are flying somewhere.

In Chapter 2, the experiences of bodily shame and punishment are revealed again, now in the form of a story in which little Maria’s whole body is invaded and bitten by crawling ants. The experiences of sin and shame take an even more bodily expression than before:

But I don’t exist anymore. A brown, roaring hymn: – When a sinner only. They even run to the forbidden direction and visit places where I have never been. I have not even thought. Mother says that those places have no names, at least they are not uttered.

– Don’t sing so loudly. I will speak, I will confess. I have been, I have said. I have watched from the mirror and also the neighbor’s girl has. Annaliina doesn’t know. Mother probably knows and turns the ant highway inside me. Father, poor father cannot stop mother. And also father thinks that I have. Always me. Kind. I won’t touch. I won’t speak.

And when the tongue is bitten millions of times and sprayed with a burning liquid, it won’t speak anymore. Legs are filled with brown, dry needles. The eye is an ant’s egg. There is a lot of room for paths inside the fingers, also in the hair. The hair is brown already.

Kun kieleen purraan miljoonia kertoja ja ruiskutetaan polttavaa nestettä, ei se puhu enää. Jalat ovat täynnä ruskeita, kuivuneita havunneulasia.
Chapter 5: A Shattering World

Silmä on muurahaisen muna. Sormiin mahtuu paljon käytäviä, samoin hiusten sekaan. Hiuksetkin ovat jo ennestään ruskeat. (LL 80.)

Again, there are several levels of reality: a fragment from a Pietist hymn about sin,353 a possible memory of her mother forbidding talk about sexual organs and looking at one’s vagina in a mirror, a possible memory of sitting in an ants’ nest and being bitten, and a hallucination of shame which gets a bodily manifestation: an experience of ants biting Maria’s tongue “millions of times” and invading her fingers and hair, her eyes turning into ant eggs. The story enacts a culturally regulated experience and a narrative about sexuality: there are body parts that are taboos—that cannot be spoken about and that cannot be seen.354

Furthermore, the “legends” reveal experiences of inexplicable guilt—what phenomenological psychiatry would describe as delusions of guilt. In Chapters 14 and 15, Maria is doing “Saul’s work” at the hospital: the narrator describes how Saul makes Maria persuade her roommate Pirjo to hurt herself and Pirjo tries to commit suicide. However, soon we find out that Maria has not actually done anything. Nurse Untuva tells her that “Pirjo will recover, I just called the intensive care, don’t worry. And now listen to me carefully, Maria. You have not been to the city, you have not bought any razor blades and given them to Pirjo. You have been in your room the whole night and slept well. You were given a tranquilizer last night. You are not Pirjo, Maria, you have not done anything.”355 Later, in Chapter 17, the guilt and self-accusations are made even more explicit in a scene in which Maria is accused by jury of masturbation. This time (a hallucinated figure of) Johannes tries to explain to her that she is not guilty of anything: “Johannes (whispers): – Maria, you must learn to see the difference between what is real and what is imaginary. You are not guilty. Remember that you have not done anything forbidden, no matter what they said.”356

353 The line is from the hymn book Siionin virret (Hymns of Zion): “When a sinner only / Can fall asleep in the wounds of the Lord, from the lap of the earth / He will arise in joy.” (“Kun syntinen vaan / Saa nukkua haavoihin Herran, niin helmasta maan / Hän nousevi riemuhun kerran.”) (Siionin virret 218: 3.) As noted earlier, Vaara writes in the same Pietist tradition as Mukka.

354 This is made explicit in a later hallucinatory memory in which little Maria asks a teacher about frogs she has seen mating: “I cannot talk to mother. Mother would hit me, because now I understand that this is one of those things that don’t exist at our home. Those cannot be talked about at home.” (“En voi puhua äidille. Äiti löisi minua, sillä nyt ymmärrän, että tämä on niitä asioita, joita meillä ei ole olemassa. Niitä ei voi kotona puhua.”) (LL 153.)

356 “Johannes (kuiskaa): – Maria, sinun pitää kyetä näkemään ero todellisen ja kuvitellun väliillä. Et sinä ole syyllinen. Muista, sinä et ole tehnyt mitään luvatonta, vaikka he mitää sanoisivat.” (LL 164.)
These ambiguous feelings of guilt can be traced to cultural norms and to the mother figure, and are enacted in the stories that haunt Maria. At the same time, the content of the stories can be linked to traumatic experiences, shame about sexuality, and past experiences of physical punishment. The hallucinations Maria goes through come close to flashbacks: they form an unwilling reenactment of the past, reminding us of the ways traumatic and psychotic experiences may resemble one another (Ratcliffe 2017, 162). Yet, at the same time, the past can be changed: memory is always transformative, and perhaps telling the stories can shape the experiences of pain and shame into a new, less painful, form.

Therapeutic Images and Narratives

A continuous aim in Maria’s writing is to “go through” the “images” and “legends” which haunt her, in order to set herself free from them. In Chapter 19, we are told how the Virgin Mary brings Maria back to Rauhala, a house where Maria lived when she was married to Ensio, the father of her four children. The events of their marriage are gradually revealed, but in fragmentary form, and the multiple levels of reality continue to be conflated. As earlier, the scene begins by situating the readers in place and time:

We are in Rauhala. The old cabin is quiet. The big white oven feels cold although it is summer.

Mary sits in a creaky rocking chair. She is knitting a jacket for the illegitimate child of the Samaritan and I am writing by the big farmhouse table. Maria is writing.

20.6.

Finally school is over. We have moved to Rauhala and it is the summer that I am afraid of. I have to live in Rauhala with Ensio.

Olemme Rauhalassa. Vanha pirtti on hiljainen. Valkoinen suuri uuni tuntuu kylmältä, vaikka on kesä.

Maaria istuu natisevassa keinutuolissa. Hän kutoo nuttua samarialaisen aviottomalle lapselle, ja minä kirjoitan pirtin suuren pöydän ääressä, Maria kirjoittaa.

20.6.

Vihdoinkin on koulu loppunut. Olemme muuttaneet Rauhalaan ja on kesä, jota pelkään. Minun pitää asua Rauhalassa Ension kanssa. (LL 175.)

The text constructs several levels of the story at once: there is the moment in which the narrator is writing her story for the Virgin Mary—“Maria is writing”—and there is the diary-like fragment in which Maria reenacts a summer in
Chapter 5: A Shattering World

Rauhala in late June, assumedly years earlier when she was working as a teacher. As the passage suggests, she has returned to the summer that she is “afraid of.”

A fragmented short story about the summer follows. The core of it is that during haymaking time, Ensio has insisted that they hire a maid to help them. In the nightmarish story, Maria is not an adult married to Ensio but a little girl—but she is also the maid’s former teacher. As Maria tries to tell the story to the Virgin Mary, she also comments on the writing process:

The Virgin Mary. It is not actually me who is writing. I cannot write because I have no hands.

– Maria, tell everything in the right order, one of the scattered says.
– You don’t have to use the most horrible words, let’s put away those voices and images that you cannot handle and that you cannot show to Mary.

Neitsyt-Maaria. En se oikeastaan ole minä, joka kirjoittaa. Enhän minä voi kirjoittaa, koska minulla ei ole käsiä.

– Maria, kerro oikeassa järjestyksessä, sanoo irrallinen. – Eihän sinun ole pakko käyttää kaikkein pahimpia sanoja, pannaan äänet ja kuvat pois, joita et kestä ja joita et uskalla Maarialle näyttää. (LL 177.)

As discussed earlier, traumatic experiences are difficult to narrate (see also Whitehead 2004; Andrews 2010). Here they are first enacted by explicitly commenting on their painful nature and the difficulty of telling anyone about them: Maria cannot write because she “does not have hands.” The scattered urge Maria to narrate everything “in the right order” but they also say, supportively, that she does not have to use the “most horrible” words and images. We then find out that, one night, little Maria finds Ensio drunk and naked in the barn with the maid. But the story is never finished, and it is unclear what has actually happened and who the characters are. After finding the two people, Maria tells the Virgin Mary that she cannot write any more, and we come to the part of the story which seems the most distressing. The scattered tell Maria that she does not have to write because she is dead now and that Ensio has shot four unborn children in Maria’s womb. The chapter about Rauhala then ends on the psychiatric ward. We see Untuva comforting Maria: “– Lie still, Maria, Untuva says and holds me with both hands. I am shaking. It’s difficult to stay in bed, but Untuva holds me tight. / – You can make it for a short while still, Johannes is coming, Maria, Johannes is coming.”

Even though the images are painful, Maria insists that going through them is an important part of her “treatment.” Later, in Chapter 21, Maria explains her world and its characters to a fellow patient in the ward:

357 “– Makaa hiljaa, Maria, Untuva sanoo ja pitelee molemmin käsin. Minä vapisen. On vaikeaa pysyä sängyssä, mutta Untuva pitelee lujasti. / – Sinä jaksat vielä vähän aikaa, Johannes tulee heti, Maria, Johannes tulee.” (LL 179.)
Fictions of Madness

The Virgin, Mary the Virgin. She has been participating in the treatment all along. Then there are also my other people. First there is Johannes and a long way after him, come Paul and the Virgin Mary. And the scattered, one can never get rid of them. Then there are of course father and mother and Ensio. They are all of course dead, but so am I. It is sometimes difficult, because I would not have patience to rest in the coffin and stay on that side. I have so many worlds of my own and I should have time to visit them all. Then I sometimes must shatter and go to pieces and each piece has time to visit where it should. It is just so difficult to collect them once they are so scattered.

Maria makes explicit the therapeutic function of her hallucinations, her unsettling experience of being dead (what psychiatry knows as the “Cotard delusion”), and “shattering” and collecting the pieces. In the following chapters, we are offered several more story fragments which hint at traumatic events. For example, in Chapter 23 Maria is pregnant with Ensio’s child (she is expecting “Annaliina” who has also appeared in some of the legends) and is afraid to tell her mother about the pregnancy. She looks for an “angel maker” to give her an abortion, but her mother says that she has sinned and must marry Ensio and move to Rauhala. Finally, Maria tells that she has lost “the orchid baby.”

358 “Näitä kuvia on vaikea katsoa. Mutta minun täytyy katsoa ne loppuun saakka. Johannes on sanonut. Silloin ne ehkä lakkaavat tekemästä kipeää.” (LL 210.)

In the end, it remains unclear what has happened in Maria’s past. Recurring motifs in all the legends and images are her mother’s violent behavior and threats, the shame connected to imagining and hearing voices, and even deeper shame and guilt which is tied to sexuality. Maria is also haunted by Ensio, his sexuality and violence, and she repeatedly re-enacts a loss of a child or children. But we never learn exactly what has happened. In the end, more important than creating a coherent autobiographical narrative out of the fragments is the story of Maria’s recovery: the way she tries to heal herself by going through the images and the stories. In the final chapter of the novel, all the other characters, figures, and voices have disappeared, Maria has been discharged from hospital and she is alone with Satan. He tells Maria that she is completely alone in the world and leaves her with a bottle of pills. On the final page, Maria telephones Johannes and he answers. The following two novels of Vaara’s initial trilogy focus more closely on Maria’s and Johannes’s relationship, on Maria’s journey in becoming a writer and the difficulties and successes of her therapy. The novels become less fragmentary and less layered: the “dirty legends” have ended and the focus of the narration is on the recovery.

5.4. Knowledge and Understanding in Fictional and Auto-fictional Stories of Shattering

An inextricable fusion of phenomenal experience [...] and cultural meanings, is what we understand by normal subjective experience, and find in all memoirs [...]. (Radden & Varga 2013, 112.)

As discussed at the beginning of this chapter, there is skepticism concerning the knowledge we can gain from reading autobiographical accounts of illness (see Radden & Varga 2013): problems of memory and language, the aesthetic design, dramatization, and literary devices all “distort” the “actual” experiences. What can we then learn from reading books like Vaara’s? What kind of cultural work do her novels do?

Vaara’s works have a clear political aim: her writings depict psychotic experiences and highlight their connection to other modes of intentionality, as well as to traumatic events and experiences. By inviting readers to reflect on the emergence and content of the hallucinatory experiences, Likaiset legendat shows that they are not “abnormal” mental states, but rather modes of interaction with the world—just like perception, imagination, remembering, or dreaming—albeit often distressing and unsettling. In her later novel, Myrkyseitikki (1980), Maria reflects on the publication of Likaiset legendat and states the political aim of her works explicitly:

Who would dare to read it [The Dirty Legends] so that they would find in it a normal human being, drawing a picture of a life that is inside everyone, as long as one dares to face it? What if every one of us has Maria’s schizophrenic garden inside us if we just hoe up the soil surface that covers it?

This was Vaara’s message in the 1970s, when people suffering from schizophrenia were still most often institutionalized and the diagnosis was extremely stigmatizing. During the intervening decades, researchers have again started to understand psychotic experiences not only as neurobiological disorders but also as normal human reactions to traumatic life events and to oppressive circumstances. Groups like the Hearing Voices Movement, feminist theorists, anthropologists, and most recently phenomenologists like Ratcliffe (2017) have emphasized the role of the interpersonal world and traumatic events in psychotic experiences. In Vaara’s novel, the content of the hallucinatory episodes reveal childhood traumas and marital abuse. The psychotic images show a culture in which sexuality is considered as shameful and a sin. The psychotic experiences convey a meaning, as psychiatrist Claes Andersson (1974) wrote in his afterword to Likaiset legendat. In Vaara’s works, this meaning is passed on through the construction of the psychotic experiential world and by inviting readers “inside” it. It is close to ineffable: it is experiential and affective, and yet it can be shared through creative and artistic means—through the fictional worlds and aesthetic language.

Instead of aiming to create a factual and chronological account of one’s life, Vaara’s life-writing is different. The text seeks to convey experiences of unsettling changes in one’s body and sense of self, hallucinatory voices, dreams, and memories that are not a part of the consensus world. This is stated from the outset, in the preface: “No one in this book exists in reality, because not everything that is true is real.” Rather than telling us “facts” about Maria’s life, the focus is on the experiences and their personal truth. The text invites the therapist and the readers to listen, as we saw in the preface: “We know a lot about something that you, Johannes, don’t know anything about. / But listen anyway.” We are not asked to take the place of the other or think that we can feel what another person is feeling, but rather to read closely, listen attentively, and reflect.

Likaiset legendat is somewhere between fiction and non-fiction, and when we read the text, we know that some of the experiences depicted in it belonged to their author. On the one hand, this knowledge enhances what one of the founders of narrative medicine, Rita Charon (2016a&b), has described as “the intersubjective encounter” created by literature: when we read, we can imagine the human being behind the words, connect with other readers, and become conscious of and recognize our own experiences. The knowledge that Vaara’s text is based on actual experiences of psychosis may guide readers to approach it differently, perhaps more seriously, than they would if they thought of it as purely fictional. On the other hand, the knowledge of the partial fictionality opens up the text, creating space for the readers’ imagination. It is often suggested that autobiographies arouse suspicion and critical distance in readers, whereas fiction may invite readers closer because it frees us from responsibility to protect ourselves through skepticism and distrust (see Keen 2007, 88; 106).

359 “Tässä kirjassa kukaan ei ole todellisuutta, sillä kaikki, mikä totta on, ei ole todellisuutta.” (LL 5.)
360 “Tiedämme paljon siitä, mistä sinä, Johannes, et tiedä mitään. / Kuuntele silti.” (LL 5.)

Leah Anderst (2015, 277) has explored the techniques of narrative empathy in non-fiction and suggested that autobiographies invite empathetic responses in readers by self-reflexively pointing to the problems of telling about one’s life accurately. This is particularly true in a text like Vaara’s, which constantly doubts its own veracity and points toward the shattering of the borders between what is real and what is not.

Likaiset legendat differs from the fictional narratives of Kaunis sielu, Tottori Finckelman and Tabu in two important ways: the text is framed as autobiographical and the mental suffering described in it is given a diagnostic label, schizophrenia. However, the narrative techniques Vaara uses in her autobiographical fiction are similar to those in the other texts. The novel makes use of the narrative form to open the experiential world of its protagonist up to the readers: it creates spaces in which different temporalities are layered, it evokes experientiality through detailed description, images, and metaphors, and it moves between different perspectives, creating a multifaceted image of a subject.

Like the other texts, Vaara’s novel also constantly challenges our efforts to read it through diagnostic or psychological frames of reference. In addition to the sense of experientiality, Likaiset legendat creates aesthetic and ethical meanings which go beyond psychological insights.
Conclusion

Considering how common illness is, how tremendous the spiritual change that it brings, how astonishing, when the lights of health go down, the undiscovered countries that are then disclosed, what wastes and deserts of the soul a slight attack of influenza brings to view [...] when we think of this, as we are so frequently forced to think of it, it becomes strange indeed that illness has not taken its place with love and battle and jealousy among the prime themes of literature. (Woolf 2012, 3.)

There is, let us confess it (and illness is the great confessional), a childish outspokenness in illness; things are said, truths blurted out, which the cautious respectability of health conceals. About sympathy for example—we can do without it. That illusion of a world so shaped that it echoes every groan, of human beings so tied together by common needs and fears that a twitch at one wrist jerks another, where however strange your experience other people have had it too, where however far you travel in your own mind someone has been there before you—is all an illusion. We do not know our own souls, let alone the souls of others. Human beings do not go hand in hand the whole stretch of the way. There is a virgin forest in each; a snowfield where even the print of birds’ feet is unknown. Here we go alone, and like it better so. Always to have sympathy, always to be accompanied, always to be understood would be intolerable. (Ibid., 11–12.)

In her famous essay “On Being Ill” (1926), Woolf pays attention to two things that have been important throughout this study. First, she observes that illness changes us and the world around us. She writes about a “spiritual change” that illness brings, about “the undiscovered countries that are then disclosed.” Being immersed, present, in the world and in one’s body is not something that should be taken for granted. The sense of reality and sense of being in the world is easily shattered for example due to traumatic events—or even because of a sudden attack of influenza. When the old, familiar world is lost, a new and unsettling one appears. It is also significant that Woolf begins her essay with notes on something as mundane as the flu, and yet her remarks apply as well to the most severe experiences of trauma and psychosis. Secondly, she states that we can “do without sympathy”—if sympathy means the simulation of the experiences of another. As Woolf notes: “We do not know our own souls, let alone the souls of others.” And further: “Always to have sympathy, always to be accompanied, always to be understood would be intolerable.” She points out the problems of sympathy: the power imbalance, the intrusion into the world of another. Like the narrators discussed in this study, she reminds us that although literature grants us an “access” to the minds of the others, minds also hide things—from ourselves as well as from others—and it is not even desirable that everything would be revealed. Finally, Woolf’s essay offers also a third, additional insight: although illness was not a “prime theme of literature” in 1926, it soon became one—and its prominence has lasted until today.
Conclusion

This study has explored the shattering minds and worlds constructed in four modernist Finnish novels written in between 1928 and 1974. I have looked at the ways readers are invited to engage with the minds and worlds created in the novels and suggested that the texts ask their readers to become immersed in the shattering worlds and at the same time reflect on them, their aesthetic features and ethical and political meanings. We are called to share worlds and to imagine experiences of others, to become “invaded” by minds of others, yet without losing ourselves and our sense of embodied being in the world or the understanding of the difference between the self and the other. Reading fiction thus involves a kind of double bookkeeping: an experience of two worlds at the same time. The analyses have also paid attention to the ethical questions and power relations inherent in storytelling and in reading about mental illness: the problems of narrating the experiences of pain and suffering and the danger of appropriation as well as the need for an ethical distance. Readers are invited to attune to experiences of others, while at the same time recognizing their particularity and difference.

Furthermore, the analyses have explored the questions of knowledge and understanding about experiences of pain and suffering which is created in and through narratives. I have shown that “fictions of madness” offer phenomenological insights about experiences of mental distress, as well as understanding of the ways cultural narratives and norms shape minds and experiences. The “fictions of madness” invite readers to go beyond diagnostic labels, while at the same time acknowledging experiences of suffering and pain and without romanticizing “madness.” By making us shift our focus from labels and categories to experiences and experiential worlds, the texts discussed in this study also work against the stigmatization of mental illnesses in the actual world.

The study participates in the recent discussions in critical medical humanities from a narratological, phenomenological (or embodied cognitive), and feminist perspective. The focus of medical humanities has in recent years shifted from the questions of how literature can create communication and educate its readers about experiences of illness toward a more socially and politically conscious critique of cultural and medical notions of health and illness (see, e.g., Whitehead 2014; Whitehead & Woods 2016). The analyses conducted in this study have answered traditional medical humanities questions about the ways fictional narratives convey experiences of illness and create empathy in new ways, emphasizing the constructed nature of the experiences portrayed and evoked in literature, the aesthetic and political forms carried out in the narratives, and the affective and reflective responses of the readers. The combination of rhetorical, cognitive and unnatural narratology has helped me to theorize and describe the reader’s interaction with the fictional minds and experiential worlds created in the texts and to outline the narrative strategies employed by the authors. The phenomenological, embodied cognitive, and feminist perspectives, in turn, have provided me tools and concepts to look at how the body and the mind and biological and cultural are constantly intertwined, and how subjects are shaped by their social and material circumstances.

The analyses have also offered new perspectives on Finnish modernist literature. They have shown the ways affectivity, aesthetics and ethics are intertwined in Finnish modernist works. The readings of Hämäläinen’s Kaunis sielu and Vaara’s Likaiset legendat are the first extensive ones ever made on these texts and this study has hopefully contributed also in situating them as part of the Finnish modernist tradition. I have argued that Kaunis sielu is an early, fully modernist text which creates new forms of expression and challenges cultural narratives and norms that govern gender and sexuality. I have shown how Likaiset legendat creates an evocative portrayal of the world of psychosis and reveals how experiences are shaped by culture. Korpela’s Tohtori Finckelman and Mukka’s Tabu, in turn, have been discussed from a new, politically engaged perspective, which has illuminated the ways the texts employ but also criticize oppressive narratives about gender and sexuality. The analyses have revealed the complexity of first-person narration and the ways the texts invite us to read the narrator-protagonists “behind” their backs. Both Korpela’s and Mukka’s novels have also raised difficult questions about the ethics of reading and readers’ responsibility in the recognition of experiences of trauma and violence. The analyses have tried to show how extremely different readings and interpretations the ambiguous and unsettling texts can invite. As Woolf writes: “Human beings do not go hand in hand the whole stretch of the way.” The multitude of different kinds of possible readings which the discussed novels may produce—and hopefully will in the future—is also one way in which the texts do their ethical and artistic work: they keep us engaged with difference.
Bibliography

Primary

Hämäläinen, Helvi 2001 Kaunis sielu. Helsinki: WSOY.
Korpela, Jorma 1996/1952 Tohtori Finckelman. Porvoo: WSOY.

Secondary

Bibliography

Dostoyevsky, Fyodor 2012 “The Dream of a Ridiculous Man” (1877). In Fyodor Dostoyevsky, Short Stories. The Project Gutenberg EBook.

Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5) 2013 American Psychiatric Association.

Bibliography

Herman, David 2002 Story Logic. Problems and Possibilities of Narrative. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.

290
Bibliography

Lahtinen, Toni 2013 Maan höyryväässä sylissä. Helsinki: WSOY.

Bibliography

Melkas, Kukku 2006 Historia, halu ja tiedon kärme Aino Kallaksen tuotannossa. Helsinki: SKS.

295
Bibliography

Paavolainen, Olavi 1932 Suursiivous, eli, Kirjallisessa lastenkamarissa. Jyväskylä: Gummerus.

  – 2010 Social Minds in the Novel. Columbus: Ohio State University Press.

Phelan, James 1989 Reading People, Reading Plots: Character, Progression, and the Interpretation of Narrative. Chicago: University of Chicago Press

Richardson, Brian 2006 Unnatural Voices. Extreme Narration in Modern and Contemporary Fiction. Columbus: The Ohio State University Press.

Stang, Alexandra 2015 Possibilities, Silences. The Publishing and Reception of Queer Topics in Finland during the Interwar Years (and Beyond). Diss. Helsinki: University of Helsinki.

Bibliography

